Latest Parliamentary Intelligence.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

FRIDAY, Dec. 11.

THE FRENCH AFRICAN IMMIGRATION.

The Earl of Shaftsbury asked the government for information respecting an arrangement that had been made by certain parties in France, with the sanction of the French Government, to obtain a supply of African laborers for French Colonies from Lagos.

Lord Clarendon said it was true the project for providing laborers for French Colonies from the east coast of Africa had been sanctioned by the French Government, but provisions had been made that it should be bona fide emigration, though he was of opinion that the result would ultimately be to encourage the slave trade, as had been the case of similar plans for the benefit of the English Colonies. After some remarks from the Earl of Derby, and Earl Grey the subject dropped.

The Bank Issues Indemnity Bill, after some discussion, passed through a stages, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, Dec. 11.

ISTHMUS OF SUEZ CANAL.

Mr. Griffiths gave notice that on an early day after the recess he should enquire of the first Minister whether the French ambassador had applied to the Porte to sanction the project of the Isthmus of Suez Canal.

THE ADMISSION OF BARON ROTHSCHILD.

Mr. Thomas Duncombe gave notice that immediately after the recess he should call attention to the fact, that during the two preceding Parliaments only three members for the city of London had taken their seats, and moved that Baron Rothschild, a member of the Jewish persuasion, having been returned a member of the city of London, be permitted to take the oaths appointed by law, in such form as shall be most binding upon his conscience, and in accordance with the faith he professes.

MORETON BAY AND NEW SOUTH WALES.

In reply to Lord A. Churchill, Mr. Labouchere stated that it had been determined to separate Moreton Bay from the colony of New South Wales, and the boundary would run north of Clarence river.—He could not at that time state precisely of what nature the Government would be.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.

In reply to Mr. Kinnaird, Mr. Cowper said it was his intention after the recess to introduce a bill to regulate the qualifications that would be required hereafter for the admission of members to the medical profession.

TRANSFER OF LAND IN IRELAND.

Replying to Mr. Vance, the Attorney-General for Ireland said it was his intention, after the reassembling of Parliament, to submit to the House a bill upon the subject of the transfer of land in Ireland.

THE BANKRUPT LAWS.

Replying to Mr. Headlam, the Attorney General admitted that the bankruptcy law was defective, and stated that it was now under the consideration of her Majesty's Government.

INDIAN MUTINEERS.

Replying to Mr. A. Mills, Mr. V. Smith said, the Government considered that it would be expedient to spare the lives of such of the Indian mutineers as were not concerned in the perpetration of the atrocities, and to transport them; but they could only be sent to such colonies as were willing to receive them. The question was one of great difficulty, and he could only say that it occupied the attention of the Governor General and her Majesty's Government.

CORPORATION OF LONDON.

In answer to Sir De Lacy Evans, Sir G. Grey said it was the intention of Government to introduce a bill, soon after the recess, for the reform of the Corporation of London.

PRIZE MONEY.

In answer to a question from Mr. Laurie, as to the distribution of prize money arising from the Crimean war and the operations in India, Sir J. Ramsden said that the prize money from the Crimean war, when distributed, would only give 2s. 6d. to each officer, and 6d. to each man. It was not, therefore, intended that any division should take place.

Mr. V. Smith replied in regard to the prize money for the Indian war, that captured property, not being re-captured property, would be divided according to the ordinary usage in such cases.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

In reply to Mr. Warren, the Attorney General said he hoped soon after the recess to be able to make a satisfactory announcement in regard to the establishment of the Department of Justice.

INDIA.

Mr. V. Smith in answer to Mr. Blackburn, said the Indian Government had not resolved to admit the principle that compensation was to be made for the property destroyed by the rebellion in India.

SLAVE TRADE.

In reply to Mr. A. Mills, Lord Palmerston said there would be no objection to lay on the table the correspondence between her Majesty's Government and the Government at Lagos, and the despatches of the members on the West Coast of Africa, relative to the Government assuming the sovereignty.

Mr. Hennessy wanted to ask whether it was true that when the King of Delhi was made prisoner, an assurance was given to him that his life would be spared, and if true, by whose authority the assurance was given.

Mr. V. Smith said the Governor General had given orders for the trial of the King of Delhi, directing that if he had surrendered on the promise that his life should be spared, he should be sent on to Alumbagh to be sent out of the country. Information had since been received that Captain Hodson, who arrested the King, did promise that his life should be spared, and that promise having been made by an officer in the service it would be fulfilled.

DR. LIVINGSTONE'S EXPEDITION.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in moving the postponement of the order for the Committee of Supply Bill until after Christmas, stated that it was intended to propose a vote to defray the expense of Dr. Livingstone's expedition of discovery up the Zambesi river. It was necessary the expedition should arrive in that river in the month of March, and the amount of the expense, about £5,000, would be advanced out of the civil contingency, to be repaid by vote.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Lord Palmerston took the opportunity of stating the course which the Government wish to propose in regard to public business. He proposed that the Bank Indemnity Bill should receive the royal assent to-morrow (Saturday), and that the House should then adjourn till the 4th of February. He also proposed to postpone General Havelock's Annuity Bill till after the recess, and in the meantime to amend the bill by extending the pension to the next succeeding life. (Loud cheer.)

Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald observed that General Havelock had been exposed to unnecessary dangers by the tardy movements of the Government in not sending him relief, bad arrangements with regard to the conveyance of troops in the East. He argued that troops should have been sent out by Suez.

Lord Palmerston censured the hon. member for taking an occasion when the reward of merit was the subject for discussion to make an attack upon her Majesty's ministers. The Government considered that they had taken the best measures in their power for relieving the Indian army, and it was their intention not to oppose the investigation of the question to which the hon. member referred by a select committee. He considered that any minister who had sent troops by Suez would have been worthy of impeachment.

Sir John Pakington admitted the inconvenience of raising the discussion at that time, but thought the hon. member was not open to censure for taking the last opportunity offered before the adjournment of bringing forward a subject upon which much anxiety was felt. He was surprised that Government had acceded to a motion which he (Sir J. Pakington) looked upon as a censure on their conduct.

Colonel Sykes justified the conduct of the Court of Directors in regard to the mutiny.

Lord J. Russell having expressed his gratification at the extension of General Havelock's person to his son, the discussion terminated.

The Havelock Pension Bill was postponed till the 4th of February.

The Public Health Amendment Act Bill was also postponed to the same day.

THE BANK ACT OF 1844.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Bank Act 1844, 7 and 8 Vic., cap. 32; and of the Bank Acts of Ireland and Scotland of 1845, 8 and 9 Vic., cap. 37 and 38. The right hon. gentleman entered at great length into the propositions for the amendment of the Act of 1844, contending that they would provide no security against the danger of commercial distress. In a commercial crisis he believed it would be found that the Legislative Government was comparitively powerless, and he thought it was a great error to suppose that Parliament could devise some sudden panacea to restore confidence when it had been shaken by commercial difficulties. The Government were of opinion that the Bank Directors should continue to circulate notes under the control of the Act of 1844, and that if there were to be any relaxing power it should rest with the Executive Government.—Looking to the precedent of 1848, the readiness with which the House granted the Bill of Indemnity, he did not think there would be any danger if the Government continued in monetary crisis to suspend the Act of 1844 and immediately call Parliament together. Mr Disraeli could not but think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had forgotten the cause for which Parliament was called together when he said that currency had nothing to do with the question: and if currency had nothing to do with the question, why had the right honorable gentleman and his friends violated the act of 1844? The committee for which the right hon. gentleman had moved would, according to the terms of the motion go over grounds that had been gone over before, and the object of the amendment which he had placed on the paper was that the labors of former acts and committees should have a practical result. If the House assented to the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the results of members he stopped, and when they met on the 4th of February no one would be able to submit to Parliament a substitute on the subject. The right hon. gentleman expressed his opinion that the unlimited convertible currency could never depreciate, and concluded his remarks, by moving as an amendment to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's motion, that, in the opinion of this house, no further enquiry is necessary into the operation of the Bank Act of 1844, Tooke & Wilson[illegible]th. Mr. [illegible] said [illegible] the [illegible] country [illegible] the [illegible] Act [illegible] Mr. [illegible] Arthur [illegible] Lady [illegible] other [illegible] her [illegible]

[illegible] that the amount of bullion had reached 8,000,000, and the reserve 4,000,000, and he thought there never had been a time in which the operation of the Bank Acts could be more approbately, and with so much interest enquired into than now.—There were many differences of opinion as the bearing of the Act of 1844, on the late crisis, and he therefore entreated the House to submit this matter to a committee, and not to run precipitately into legislation on the subject. He considered that there was no cause for altering a law under which all the requirements upon the capital of the country had been safely met, notwithstanding that the demands had been heavy.—The committee of last year had reported that, having gone through their labour in regard to England, it was neces sary to institute inquiry into the Bank Act of Ireland and Scotland, and he urged the House not to legislate without full inquiry and not to follow the retrograde motions of 1826, 1837, and 1839—Mr. Gladstone concurred in the warnings of his right hon. friend against retrogressive legislation, though he could not agree in the manner in which they were applied. The evidence on the subject was accumulated beyond the possibility of further information being obtained, and he did not think their ignorance upon what principle the Government intended that the currency should be based was worthy of the dignity of Parliament. The Bank Act had failed on two occasions and it could not stand as it was. They must look for a continuance of these crises, and he could not consent they should be habitually met by a breach of the law of the land. The act of 1844, which was damaged in 1847, was totally shattered in 1857. Lord Overston had himself expressed an opinion that the time had come when some elastic provisions should be inserted in the act of 1844, to meet the pressure of a commercial panic. This he understood as an avowal of the evils which must arise from a recurring violation of the law which left the power in the hands of the ministry to decide what houses should be ruined and what should be saved. Much of the evil in the late difficulties had arisen from the confusion which prevailed in the public mind between the functions of currency and banking. People looked to the bank to get them out of a financial difficulty, and he was afraid that this misapprehension could only be removed by the amendment of the Act of 1844. But all these disasters were to be postponed for further enquiry, though he (Mr. Gladstone) saw nothing to prevent Government from proposing to [illegible] a measure when they meet again after the recess, and he believed that such a measure would be introduced [illegible] did but [illegible] in favour of such a proceeding. There were many subjects to go before the committee if the times were quiet and easy; but he contended that the late panic and the present distress were subjects for legislation. To overcrowd a committee was to stifle enquiry. The question now to be faced was what was the cause of the late crisis? and how far such disasters might be avoided for the future by legislation; and this subject be considered, ripe for discussion, and one that ought to be discussed in the House.—Mr. Malins declared that the hour of legislation had arrived, and stated his intention of supporting the amendment.—Mr. Horsfall defended the appointment of the committee.—Mr. Weguelin thought if they were to carry out the provisions of the act of 1844, to the letter, all advances on discounts should have ceased on the 5th of November.—Mr. Blakemore expressed an opinion in favour of the Government proposition.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer then briefly replied.

The House then divided, the numbers were:—

For the original motion, 295; against, 117; majority for the Chancellor of the Exchequer's motion, 178.

The other business on the paper was then disposed of, and the House adjourned.

Puseyite Convents in England. Painful Narrative.

At East Grinstead, in the county of Sussex, England, in a Puseyite convent, of which Miss Greame is the Lady Superior, and the Rev. J. M. Neale is the father confessor and active manager. The death of a young lady in this convent and the circumstances attending her decease and burial were the occasion of a riot at Lewes, where the interment took place, and have since led to some remarkable and painful revelations, the result of which has been that the Bishop of Chichester, who has permitted his name to be used in sanction of the institution, has publicly withdrawn his patronage and approval. The whole fact of the case are so full of interest, and so suggestive, that we condense them into a brief narrative.

The institution at East Grinstead is called St. Margaret's; its head is addressed as Lady Superioress, and its inmates as Sisters of Mercy, having abandoned their proper names and taken the vows of nuns, whose dress and habits they have adopted to the full extent. The convent is governed and conducted exactly on the principles of similar Papal institutions. The Rev. John Scobell is the rector of the Parish of Southover, whose daughter in the winter of 1851-2 became slightly imbued with the views of Dr. Pusey. She was of age, a young lady of quick imagination and strong religious impressions." In the spring of 1852, while residing at Exeter with some relatives, she took music lessons from a Miss Arthur, who, though professionally a music teacher, appears to have been secretly connected with a Puseyite convent at Oxford, under the superintendence of Dr. Pusey himself of which Miss Arthur and the Lady Superioress of East Grinstead were friends. [illegible] Miss Arthur appears to have visited in the [illegible] Scobell was known to have a large amount. The request was made known to Mr. S. by his daughter, but he earnestly refused his permission. The father, in the course of a touching narrative says:—

"My refusal of consent appeared to be conclusive. Miss Marian Hughes, S. M., wrote to me herself; and the first attempt to take my daughter from me was defeated. The next step brings me nearly toward the close of the year 1854, when a young female, habited in black of peculiar style, took up her residence at the White Hart, at Lewes. I was at that time frequently visiting a certain bed-ridden parishioner, and so likewise was my daughter, who had always been assiduous among the poor. This lady, whose name was Miss Wilkins, called on me, and stated that at Oxford she had heard of this sick person—that she had known her in her early life—that she was desirous of visiting her, and requested my consent and permission. I said that to visit a fellow creature in sickness and sorrow was a duty open to every Christian. She persisted in asking my consent as parish priest; and observing her dress and the cross, which by a long string of beads hung at her feet, I enquired if she was a follower of Dr. Pusey. She confessed her religious opinions to be in accordance with his. I told her they were different from mine; that I believed Dr. Pusey to be in error; and that it was impossible she could visit in my name or with any authority from me. She visited frequently this sick person. My daughter did so also; there they met and became acquainted, and the chain, which had been broken, was renewed."

At about this time Miss Greame and Mr. Neale were establishing the convent at East Grinstead, and Miss Wilkins, whose ostensible erraad was one of mercy, appears to have been sent to Lewes for no other purpose than bringing Miss Scobell within their influence: for having introduced her to Mr. Neale, at an infants' school supported by Mr, Scobell, she quickly disappeared from the scene. An interview of some hours duration then took place between Miss Scobell and Mr. Neale, which was kept secret from the lady's father. After a few months, she, being again on a visit from house, wrote to her father for permission to join Miss Greame in the East Grinstead convent stating that the Lady-Prioress had invited her. Mr. S. wrote to Miss Greame a letter, in which he earnestly, but in a Christian spirit, remonstrated against the influence that was being exerted upon his daughter to alienate her from her home and from his parental and pastoral care, refusing his consent, and begging that such proceedings might be discontinued. He was assured that his request should be heeded and his wishes respected.

This was in November, 1855. In the following month, however, his daughter's letters frequently referred to some unknown guide and counsellor whose name was carefully suppressed. They contained such expressions as these—"I have been guided by him for some time. If I have mistaken my vocation, he does not think so; and he has most strongly urged me, at times when I have had fears myself, to go on and do as I have done." "I have sent him your letters." "I do at least feel it is very difficult to know who to believe, or what to do. To my present friend I have made full and free confession."

The name of this adviser was, as we have said, carefully suppressed, but on the 10th of February, 1856, the mistress of the infant school above referred to, wrote to Mr. Scobell, under compunction of conscience, informing him that for some time she had been induced to allow his daughter the use of her own sitting room for private interviews with an unknown person. On further inquiry the participator in these clandestine meetings proved to be the Rev. J. M. Neale. Continuing his narrative Mr. Scobell says:

"After this revelation, I had further conversation with my informant, and from her I first learnt the name of Mr. Neale, the number of his visits and his letters to Miss Scobell, under cover to the school mistress, as a third confidential party, amounting to hundreds. In addition, I was informed by her of the further particulars embodied in the following letter, written to Mr. Neale immediately after:—

'Feb., 1857.

Reverend Sir,—I have not been precipitate. I have surmised a long time, with a strong degree of certainty, your practices personal and injurious to myself, and I have used forbearance towards you. There have been lately disclosed and proved to me conformatory facts on which I can depend, and more than parent and clergyman ought in silence to put up with; and I ask you what is your explanation of the following circumstances; and, as I and you may fairly call them accusations?

'1. That you have been carrying on by letter, under cover of the mistress of my infants' school, a clandestine correspondence with my eldest daughter while in my house.

'2. That you hold clandestine and secret meetings with her, of some hours' [illegible] in the private apartments of my infant school-house, situated in my parish of All Saints, Lewes.

'3. That you there usurp, dishonourably and unlawfully, the office of parish priest of All Saints' Lewes; wearing a surplice; exercising liturgical offices; receiving confession and pronouncing absolution.

'4. That you assume to yourself, and allow yourself to be viewed by my daughter and [illegible] in the character of her spiritual [illegible] adviser, to my detriment as her natural [illegible] and lawful parish priest; that you [illegible] in that character, at her hands, the [illegible] of me, her father, for your personal [illegible] and dictate how they should be replied to—how far complied with—why far rejected.

'5. That you seek to bind and keep up [illegible] in my house. That you seek to [illegible] by letter, under cover of the mistress of [illegible] school, a clandestine correspondence with my eldest daughter while in my house. That you [illegible] in my house, [illegible] to be by that she was [illegible] in clandestine correspondence with you, and that she was [illegible] to you [illegible] and that she was [illegible] to you [illegible] and that she was [illegible] to you [illegible] town for a surrender, a flag from the gig of the captain was to be raised three times, and then all the batteries should pour in their fire, the Saratoga to use shot and shell, and the boats grape and shrapnell. All the howitzers were loaded with shrapnell for the first discharge, which must have been very destructive had resistance been made, for the main body of the Nicaraguans was wholly unprotected by works; besides, the range of two of the boats was such as to enfilade and rake the stockade at the guardhouse, the only fortification on the Point. In the meantime, the land force, consisting of 385 marines and sailors, by order of Captain Eagle, formed under cover of the company's buildings, and emerging from their shelter, proceeded up the beach, and took up position quartering on the rear of Walker's position, out of the line of fire of the guns from the Saratoga or the boats, but in such proximity as to be in readiness should the exigency require a hand to hand fight, to charge Walker's camp. The object of the Commodore evidently was to overawe the Nicaraguans, or else to overwhelm them by superior force poured in upon them from commanding positions. When the above disposition of the forces had been arranged, Captain Eagle of the Wabash, accompanied by his aid, A. O. Shaff, pulled off from the Fulton for the head-qarters of Walker. During this time—as Gen. Walker had received an intimation of Commodore Pauldings intention to arrest the expedition—the guard had been disarmed, and the army disbanded. Accordingly, when Captain Eagle made the wharf, no sentry warned him off; but he was met by a body of unarmed men, and among the number was Gen. Wm. Walker. The two officers met, and after a mutual recognition, shook hands, and retired into the rooms of the General. Captain Eagle handed Walker a copy of his instructions, and demanded a surrender of the place, with its arms and munitions of war.

"I surrender, sir; I am under your orders," replied the General.

"Will you have your flag lowered, then?" asked the Captain; to which the General responded by ordering the officer of the day to haul down the Nicaraguan banner. The work was done.

Some further conversation occurred between the two officers, during which Captain Eagle remarked—

"General, I am sorry to see an officer of your ability employed in such a service. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to see you at the head of regular troops."

Captain Eagle having terminated his interview, returned to his gig and pulled away for the Fulton, at the same time ordering the land and naval forces to retire. In accordance with this order, the launches returned to the Fulton and Saratoga, and the marines and seamen ashore wheeled upon their centres and marched back to the Fulton, accompanied by the band from the Wabash. Several messages passed between the Fulton and the Nicaraguan headquarters, but in the end the whole force of General Walker yielded their arms and were ordered aboard the Fulton.

The officers and men of Walker's army were taken on board the Fulton, when they were divided, the officers going on board the Saratoga and the men on board the Wabash. The arms of the Nicaraguans were taken from them and boxed up for delivery to the United States authorities. Subsequently all the men and officers were transferred to the Saratoga, and on the evening of the 12th, just twenty-nine days from the time they left Mobile Bay, the army of General Walker was on its way back to the United States.

Commodore Paulding proceeded to take possession of all the stores and munitions in the camp of General Walker, consisting of large quantities of provisions, munitions, camp fixtures, boats and furniture.

Forty or more of the Nicaraguans attempted to escape the arrest, intending to proceed up the river to the relief of Colonel Anderson, but next day most of them were captured and taken on board the Saratoga. Nine or ten, how ever managed to procure boats, in which they fled up the San Juan, and are now in all probability at Fort Castillo.

The Slave Trade.

From the London Time, Nov. 24.

As the attention of the public is rarely absorbed by more than a single subject at a time, and as one question is very apt to drive another altogether out of the field, we may perhaps be justified in doubting whether many people in these days of Indian triumphs and monetary convulsions are giving themselves much concern about the Slave Trade. Yet this nefarious traffic still subsists as much as ever, to the disgrace of humanity, and if its proportions are not quite so shocking as in days past, they have recently shown a marked tendency to expansion. Moreover, the case has its financial as well as moral aspect. Until the extinction of the trade shall have permitted the growth of legitimate commerce and enlightened views among the negro tribes, we are called upon to maintain on the coast of Africa a force of which the yearly cost was officially computed but a short time since at half a million sterling. Now as the annual expense of a regiment 1,000 strong is but some 80,000*l.*, this sum would enable us to raise and pay 15 additional battalions of infantry without a shilling's increase of taxation; or, to take another view of the matter, it would provide every year for the relief of the Indian sufferers twice as much as the generous contributions of Britain, aided by many offerings from Europe and Asia, have been found to supply.

Our resolute efforts to suppress this execrable and costly traffic have accomplished much. The trade is now almost confined to the single island of Cuba; but this island is so specious, the addiction of its inhabitants to the commerce in question is so strong, and the high prices commanded by tropical produce have operated with such stimulating power, that the result has been an unquestionable increase in the exports of slaves from the African coast. This increase has of course not been contemplated with indifference either by philanthropists or statesmen, but the expostulations provoked have in one respect taken a wrong direction. We have been assured on behalf of General Concha, the Captain-General of Cuba, that the reports circulated in Madrid with regard to his connivance at the traffic are not even traceable to the suspicions arising from former examples, but that they were due solely to the malicious or interested representations of his political opponents. These assurances, we feel bound to say, have been sustained by independent official testimony from Cuba itself, and at home also we have found the policy of General Concha's administration in respect to the Slave Trade exempted from censure by competent and impartial authority.

The difficulties we have ourselves experienced in the work of suppression under General Concha's fulness in office [illegible] all the more intelligible, without the necessity of supposing to any other negligence or connivance. If we cannot stop the import, we cannot stop the export, of those dreadful cargoes. We have much the same task before us. We have to blockade an enormous length of coast with the consciousness that advantage will be successfully taken of the least relaxation of the cordon. He has had to watch some 2,000 miles of shore, pierced with creeks in every direction, and to counteract the devices of a population every man of which is against him. It is the old law of supply and demand, and the demand is so strong that it becomes hard to intercept the current of supply attracted to satisfy it. We are informed that the Captain-General has sent one officer of eminence to Spain for trial, and that the gaols of the island are full of offenders incarcerated for breeches of the law; but such is the universal impulse, and such the dominion of self-interest, that our efforts on one side of the ocean and his on the other are nullified together, and slaves are shipped on the coast of Africa and landed on the coast of Cuba in spite of all that the combined squadrons and General Concha can do in prevention of the traffic.

But what is to be the end of all this?—Observe how one point after another appears to be gained, and still without the desired consummation. First, the assent of European States to the abolition of the traffic was formally attained, so that, according to treaty engagements, there ought to be no purchasers of slaves, and consequently no slave commerce. Next in order to bring material force in aid of moral conviction, a combined squadron was stationed on the African coast with the mission of clearing the seas of this detestable traffic, if it should ever be attempted. At length we obtain the co-operation of a Captain General on the other side of the passage, who exerts all his power to stop from disembarking the very cargoes which we try to stop from embarking; and yet the result is, that the Slave Trade acquires fresh vivacity as prices rise, and more blacks are imported into Cuba now than were imported some time ago. Of course, under such circumstances there can be no release from our obligations, and for the sake of this interminable patrol we are compelled to keep upon a thankless and unhealthy service a force of ships and men which, if they had been in the Indian waters might have turned the scale at an earlier period against the murderous mutineers. We do not say the duty can be evaded; on the contrary, these very outbreaks show the vitality of the traffic and the necessity for keeping it down, but 500,000*l.* a year, or even half that sum, is a high price to pay for failure.

We have once or twice suggested that, instead of confining our attention exclusively to the point of supply, it might possibly be serviceable to take into consideration the point of demand. After all, there is nothing unnatural in a man's not liking to be ruined, whether he is an English merchant wanting bank-notes or a tropical agriculturalist wanting labourers. We, too, on our side of the Atlantic want the produce which the tropical cultivator alone can raise, and it is simply because we are ready to buy sugar that the Cubans set General Concha at defiance in their resolution to grow it by any manner of means. Over our own West Indies we had so strong a hold that we could do as we pleased, and it pleased us that the estates of the colonies should go out of cultivation rather than that they should be cultivated by the only labour available—that of slaves. Certainly we took a share in the sacrifice, for we paid 20,000,000*l.* towards the losses incurred, but other nations are not likely altogether to admire the results or to follow the example. But, if they do not follow it, and we cannot intercept their supplies by sheer force, what are the prospects before us? Cannot some device or some provision be imagined which will leave tropical planters with some alternative between ruin and slavedealing? Slave labor is notoriously not cheap labor. Planters are used to it, and in the cultivation of certain crops it is convenient, on account of the resources which it yields at particular periods of the year, but it is always a costly agency, and just now more costly than ever. No man in his senses would long prefer to buy a slave for 300*l.* if he could hire a labourer whose passage had cost a thirtieth part of the money. As to the eventual balance of advantages, that question has been settled by the experiments in the Mauritius, where free labour has actually done more than slave labour has ever been known to do.

We know full well the remonstrances to be anticipated from our veteran Abolitionists, who denounce the idea of free negro labour, and with some plausibility, as only a covert for legalized slavedealing. What they say about the operation of such a system upon the African coast has very possibly some foundation, but it should not be forgotten that our choice lies between evils, and evils only. If it is an evil to retrace our steps, even in so small a degree and for so good a purpose,—it is an evil to revive bad passions in the breasts of African chiefs, and to show ourselves as the purchasers or purveyors of negroes in the very markets we have been attacking for years, it is also an evil to be expending money and life in a task which does not prevent cargoes of blacks from being carried across the ocean as before, and to be relying entirely upon a system of repression which, even when we have the advantage of a zealous co-operation in the Captain-General of Cuba, cannot be rendered successful or effective.

(From the European Times.)

On Saturday morning, the 29th, the work of launching the "Leviathan" was resumed, and continued up to 1 o'clock on Monday, the 30th, when the keel of the vessel was within four inches of the water, which was gradually rising under her. At two o'clock the workmen resumed their labours, when an accident happened to the machinery, which impeded further launching till 10 a. m. on Tuesday.

The utmost efforts were being made during the course of Monday night and Tuesday morning to get all ready for another start in the afternoon, but from the unavoidable delays caused in the delivery of the hydraulic rams at the yard it was impossible to make further attempts on Tuesday.—Contrary to expectation nothing was done on Wednesday, in the direct attempt at launching the vessel.

The launch was resumed at two o'clock on Thursday afternoon. On the power being applied the ship moved directly, and passed over the first foot in eleven minutes. At 2:35 she had moved altogether 473 inches at the bow and 476 at the stern. In one case she moved twelve inches at once, and a few minutes afterwards eleven inches at another move. The "Leviathan" had been moved fifteen feet further up to 6:30 p. m., when operations were suspended.—During the afternoon, a scaffold gallery, erected at a landing to the river, gave way, and a great number of persons standing on it to see the launch were precipitated to the ground; five were taken to the hospital, apparently dead.

The Times of yesterday says:—"Her total distance moved down the hill amounts now (yesterday) to 48 feet 7 inches forward, and 48 feet 6 inches aft. She has still, therefore, nearly 120 feet more to go before she will be entirely clear of the launching ways; but it is quite within the limits of probability that she will accomplish this distance in a very short time."

More than usual interest attaches to the successful completion of this monster ship, especially as she is intended to ply between Holyhead and Portland. At both ports the "Leviathan" will be free from dock and town dues, and both ports can be entered at all times of the tide, either day or night. If all the combinations contemplated are carried out, the "Leviathan" will completely revolutionize the passenger and carrying trade between England and the Western States of America, by means of the Canadian route. Freights and passage-money will be reduced one half, and the voyage be made in seven days.

The progress of the launching yesterday went on satisfactorily. At half-past four the ship had been moved 28 feet. At high water she was several feet in her future element.

(From the Times, Dec. 1.)

Soon after daylight yesterday morning Mr. Brunel, with Captain Harrison, and his indefatigible chief assistant, Mr. Prowse, were again busy at Milwall superintending the efforts by which the "Leviathan" is worked down slowly to the water, inch by inch and foot by foot. The ship has now completely quitted every part of the old foundations on which she was built, and the entire of her stupendous weight rest on the new launching ways alone. The most sinister rumors have at times been in circulation as to the disasterous results which might be anticipated when this event should happen, but as far as can be judged from the effect upon the ways at present the firmness with which they bear the vessel up exceeds the most sanguine expectations, and quite justifies the remarks which have been made by engineers that, next to the ship itself, the launching ways are the best piece of work in the yard. Their construction was contracted for by the Messrs. Treadwell, and considering the nature of the ground they had to work upon, and the severity of the test and rigidity may be considered as really astonishing. The "Leviathan" was first pushed upon them on Thursday afternoon, and so remained throughout the night, yet so little had the timber yielded under the tremendous pressure, that in the very first attempt to move the ship yesterday she instantly slipped seven feet. She made this step with the same easy gliding motion as heretofore, with an almost total absence of friction on the metals, and with only the usual hollow, solemn, reverberating noise like distant thunder. Those slips, however, are scarcely productive of any great gain in one day's work, for, the stern being much heavier than the bows, the cradle under that portion descends much more rapidly, and so turns both cradles that an immense pressure is required again to start her.—Thus, yesterday morning, after one of these slips, she displayed the most unyielding obstinacy. The tackle from the river, the screw jacks and hydraulic machines, were taxed to their utmost, the latter especially to such an extent that first a 11-inch cylinder, and next a 7-inch one gave way, and ripped the solid iron from top to bottom under the intense pressure which was exerted in them. This mishaps, however, only occasioned a temporary delay, and a renewal of the efforts, after a time, at last got another start out of the ship, and so she continued through the day, dropping from six to ten inches each time, till dusk, when the men left off, and the signal boards showed a progress of nearly 31 feet for the day's work.

The afternoon's tide yesterday placed about four feet of water under her keel, and so lightened the ways of about 1,500 of her dead weight; but apparently this made not the least difference in her rate of progress. There seems now not the least reason to doubt but that by Tuesday or Wednesday next the launch will be entirely completed.

It is reported that the fall of the scaffolding outside the yard on Thursday injured very many more people than were then conveyed to the hospital, and that the number of persons in the neighborhood who are suffering from contusions, internal injuries, and slight concussions of the brain, received on that occasion, is considerable. It seems surprising that the police should not have interfered to prevent a scaffolding not fit to bear twenty with safety from being crowded with at least a hundred people.

Later from Utah.

FIERY SPEECH OF BRIGHAM YOUNG.—DETERMINED HOSTILITY OF THE MORMONS.

We have received by the Star of the West our full files of the Deseret News to the 7th October. The news from Utah is important, as indicative of the temper of the Mormons, and the threatening attitude now definitely assumed by Brigham Young.

Brigham made a fiery speech in the "Bowery," at Salt Lake City, on the 13th September, in which his policy is clearly set forth. We give the material portions

"It is a pretty bold stand for this people to take, to say that they will not be controlled by the corrupt administrators of our general Government. We will be controlled by them if they will be controlled by the Constitution and laws, but they will not. Many of them do not care say more about the Constitution and the laws that they make, than they do about the laws of another nation. That class trample the rights of the people under their feet, while there are also many who would like to honor them. All we have asked for is our Constitutional rights. We wish the laws of our Government honored, and we have ever honored them.

There cannot be a more damnable, dastardly order issued than was issued by the Administration to this people while they were in an Indian country in 1846. Before we left Nauvoo, not less than two United States Senators came to receive a pledge from us that we would leave the United States, and then while we were doing our best to leave their borders, the poor, low, degraded curses sent a requisition for five hundred of our men to go and fight their battles! That was President Polk, and he is now weltering in hell with old Zachary Taylor, where the present administrators will soon be if they do not repent.

Liars have reported that this people have committed treason, and upon their lies the President has ordered out troops to aid in officering this Territory, and if those officers are like many who have previously been sent here, and we have reason to believe that they are not wanted, they are poor, miserable blacklegs, broken down political hacks, robbers, and whoremongers, men that are not fit for civilized society, so they must dragoon them upon us for officers. I fear that I won't have such cruel treatment, and that is enough to say, for we are just on fete upon mountain air.

[illegible] HAS THAT WARES.

I have told you that if this people will live their religion, all will be well; and I have told you that if there is any man or woman that is not willing to destroy anything and everything that would be use to an enemy if left, I wanted them to go out of the Territory, and I say so to-day, for when the time comes to burn and lay waste our improvements, if any man undertakes to shield his he will be shaved down, for he will be laid to the line and righteousness to the punishment." Now the faint-hearted can go in peace, but should the time come they must not interfere. Before I will suffer what I have in times gone by, there shall not be one building, nor one foot of lumber, nor a stick, nor a tree, nor a particle of grass and hay that will burn, left in reach of our enemies. I am sworn if driven to extremity, to entirely lay waste, in the name of Israel's God.

WHAT MIGHT BE DONE.

Admit of corrupt administrators' sending troops acre, and what would be the result! All hell would follow after. I naturally dislike to have any trouble, and would not were I not obliged to; but we are obliged to defend ourselves against the persecution of our oppressors, to have our Constitutional rights rent from us and ourselves destroyed. We must either suffer that, or stand up and maintain the kingdom of God on the earth.

We have known all the time that the kingdoms of darkness were opposed to the kingdom of God, and the powers of earth and hell were combined against it. Christ and Baal cannot make friends with each other; you cannot mix oil and water, righteous and wickedness. This is the kingdom of God; all others are of the devil. They never can be united in this world, nor in any other; there is no possibility of the two kingdoms becoming one. Those who believe and obey the gospel of the son of God, and all the rest belong to the other kingdom. There is a distinction and the line must be drawn, and you and I have to stand up to it; even though it may take from us our right eyes and right hands. We must stand up to the line and maintain the kingdom of God, or we will all go to destruction together.

I am perfectly willing that the brethren should stop all improvements, if they choose, and see what our enemies will do; though their efforts against us will only tend to use them up the faster. But if the people prefer it, they may stop their improvements and take care of their wheat, and cache a supply of grain, flour, &c., where no other persons can find it, though we can raise grain here all the time, yes, all the time.

COUNTING THE COST.

Supposing that our enemies send 50,000 troops here, they will have to transport all that will be requisite to sustain them over one winter, for I will promise them, before they come, that there shall not be one particle of forage, nor one mouthful of food for them should they come. They will have to bring all their provisions and forage, and though they start their teams with as heavy loads as they can draw, there is no team that can bring enough to sustain itself, to say nothing of the men.

It has been asked, "Have you counted the cost?" Yes, for ourselves, but I cannot begin to count the cost for our enemies. It will cost them all they have in this world, and will land them in hell in the world to come, while the only trouble with us is that we have two or three times more men than we need for using up all who can come here to deprive us of our rights.

As I said this morning, ten years ago on this ground I stated that we should not ask any odds of our enemies in ten years from that date, and the next time that I thought of it was ten years afterwards to a day.—"They are now sending their troops," the news, and it directly occurred to me, "Will you ask any odds of them?" No, in the name of Israel's God we will not, for as soon as we ask odds we get ends——of bayonets. When we have asked them for bread, they have given us stones; and when we have asked them for meat, they have given us scorpions; and what is the use of our asking any more? I do not ask any odds of those who are striving to deprive us of every vestige of freedom and to destroy us from the earth.

Suppose that they should now bow down and they should order their troops back, and then send a Governor and other officers here, how long would it be before some miserable scamp would get into a fuss with the Indians in Utah county, or in some other county, and get killed? Then the Governor would order out the Militia, probably two or three hundred men, to kill those Indians. Well, the brethren knowing that the aggressor is a white man, do not want to turn out, and, like Gen. Harney, kill the squaws, and they say, "They have committed treason," and it would be, "Send an army here, and shoot and hang them." Our enemies are determined to bring us into collision with the Government, so that they can kill us, but they shall not come here."

Westward Ho! Canada the land of the Free.

Early Spring being the proper starting time for emigrants desirous of proceeding to Canada with the intention of settling in that wonderfully flourishing British colony, and as many of our Island countrymen will, in all probability, be then on the wing in search of a new home somewhere or other in the far West, we think it a duty incumbent on us to "seize time by the forelock," and to lay before such of our stout fellow-Islesmen as are sober, industrious, and emulous of earning an honest and yeomanlike independence in a distant land, the latest information received from Canada respecting the anticipated emigration of the coming season—information which, we believe, will be highly acceptable and useful to the working classes of this country. At the present moment there is no colony of the British Crown which, amongst the English public at all events, is so generally and so deservedly popular as Canada. The causes which have produced this satisfactory result are easily to be explained. The Government of the province have taken means to make known to the world, by the publication of a carefully prepared pamphlet, in English, French, German and Norse, accurate information respecting the political constitution, physical features and natural resources of Canada. By a system of free grants of land, the industrious classes of the mother country have been invited to make Canada a new home in preference to the United States. As the Manx Sun was at first, indeed, the only insular journal to make the announcement of this wise and generous system of free grants of land, we are now greatly pleased to be enabled to supply in an authoritative form some further information on the same interesting subject. The success of the experiment may be inferred from the circumstance that at least six hundred families belonging to Canada both already settled themselves of these free grants, many of which during the past season have been in preparation for farming operations.

Not finding their exertions, however, to the [illegible] of [illegible] the [illegible] Government of the intelligent Governor General, Sir Edmund Head, has done much more for intending emigrants. It sent during the present season a circular to the authorities of every municipality in the province, inquiring what number of laborers and mechanics could be beneficially absorbed in each district. To this circular some replies had been received stating that at least twenty-two thousand farm servants, mechanics, female servants, boys and girls, could find ready and certain employment in the province. It is fully anticipated that when all the replies have been received, and the wants of the province yet more elaborately made known, that the number of laborers required will vastly exceed the amount named. But even these figures do not represent anything like the real amount of the emigration which this magnificent province can profitably receive. Supposing that one-fourth or more of these deserted emigrants should each take out a wife and two children, the probable number for the coming season will not fall short of sixty or sixty-five thousand—a number which Canada could absorb, not only with great benefit to herself but with surpassing advantage to the new comers also. There will, in addition, be a considerable body of emigrants, swelling in amount to many thousands, who will pass through Canada, on their way to the Western States. The total of the probable emigration during the approaching season may therefore be reasonably estimated at not less than one hundred and fifty thousand souls. But, strange as it may appear to our limited insular vision, the rage for emigration to Canada is by no means confined to the inhabitants of the British Isles, the popularity of that splendid colony has extended to the States of Northern and Continental Europe. We read that from ten to fifteen hundred Norwegians have already made arrangements for starting to Canada early in the coming spring. A considerable portion of these honest Norsmen and their families may probably travel onwards to the United States, but it is just as likely that the majority of them will settle down quietly in the glorious region of Canada. But, be this as it may, we mention the circumstance simply to show to our Manx compatriots that, in other countries besides England, the advantages of emigration to British North America are beginning to be recognized and appreciated.

Now, there are two classes of persons to whom Canada offers peculiar advantages. To the industrious artizan or laborer who has a small capital, just sufficient to pay the cost of his voyage, to build a log hut, and clear a small portion of the one hundred acres which the Government will give him as a free gift—these men, by the exercise of industry, will, in the course of a short time, acquire the position of independent and prosperous yeomanry, with markets for their produce opening with the extention of railroads—with good schools for the education of their children—with English laws, and with no taxes to pay except for municipal purposes. The second class is composed of emigrants without capital—the skilled artizan and the hard working labourer. The former whatever his occupation may be, is sure of finding employment in the cities and towns at wages exceeding the amount paid in the mother country. The latter, on the other hand, has only to engage himself in service for two or three years, to work hard and to save his money, and at the end of that period he will be able to buy land and commence life as a farmer, or to settle upon a free grant which would, of course, increase his capital, and thereby facilitate his agricultural operations. It should be clearly understood by al intending emigrants that without means obtained in this way, or by the possession of some small sum of money, to be at once applied in clearing and improving the land, the system of free grants can be of little immediate practical benefit to the emigrant who possesses no other fortune than his labour.

Of one grand fact, however, all our readers, whether they be present or prospective emigrants, or quiet folks of the good old stay-at-home school, may rest well assured, and that is, that the system of free grants of land will not be discontinued so long as Canada has millions of acres, capable of highly remunerative cultivation, still unsurveyed and unappropriated. We believe that to the Canadian "Bureau of Agriculture," under the careful guidance of its enlightened and able chief, Mr. Vankoughnet, is due the credit of these sagacious efforts to sympathize and regulate, with equal benefit to the province and to England, that tide of emigration which is destined at no distant day to carry British enterprise, British industry and British institutions from the banks of the St. Lawrence to the shores of the Pacific.

It is a fact which reflects high honor on the members of the Legislature of Canada, that they shrink from no rational effort, however costly in execution, which has a tendency to benefit the majestic colony whose destinies they have been chosen to guide, and especially are they to be praised for their unhesitating adoption of any measure submitted to them which is likely materially to promote the general objects of emigration. The Provincial Parliament, some considerable time ago, sanctioned a vote of £50,000 in aid of that excellent project which has (and hitherto with great success) established a line of first-class steamers from Montreal and Quebec to Liverpool—a wise and judicious measure, and one equally creditable to the sagacity, the liberality, and the public spirit of the people and legislature of Canada. That most magnificent of British colonies requires labor, and England can supply it. The former offers remunerative wages, land, and facilities of transit. What does England offer in return? She provides, in reality no system of national emigration, except by means of poor-rates, and the exertions of benevolent societies. It would seem that the thousands of industrious and steady artizans who are now thrown out of work in consequence of the vast suspension of labor throughout the manufacturing districts of England, and who are anxious to emigrate to Canada, can receive no assistance from Government.—We trust that the entire system of emigration will before long receive the early and attentive consideration of Parliament. We are persuaded that compulsatory rates for emigration might in some instances, and under proper safeguards, be beneficially applied in England, and elsewhere, to enable the poor man to remove with his family to a land where labor is abundant, where wages are high, where land is cheap or to be obtained for nothing, and where constant emigration is the most essential and necessary element of that prosperity which is fast consolidating the national existence, and the national power of Canada. Sooner or later that now youthful colony will merge in the future magnificent Kingdom or it may be EMPIRE OF CANADA.—Manx Sun.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1858.

Mr. Conger's Farewell Addresses.

Mr. Conger has just issued two Addresses; the one as Councillor, whereby he desires to inform the inhabitants of the town of Peterborough, that he will no longer take any part in the management of their municipal affairs; the other as a defeated candidate, in which character he desires to express to those who voted against him, at the County election, the utter abhorence in which he holds their political principles; and a thorough contempt of the motives which led them to make a personal change in the representation of the County.

As Mr. Conger has manifestly fallen into some errors, besides being still possessed of much original contradiction, it will not be amiss to endeavour to correct him in the one, and to cleanse him of the other. First, then, addressing the municipal body, Mr. Conger assumes and correctly no doubt, that they expect him still to continue in the service of the Town; but having determined to close his connection at the expiration of his present term, he, still very correctly, advises them of his determination so to do. Had Mr. Conger dropped his pen at this point, not a word of cavil could have been uttered against him; on the contrary, it would have been held to be the performing of a gentlemanly courtesy, whereby he at once made his obedience to his constituents, and prepared them in time for the change. However, the context entirely changes the character of his communication; for, while he feels that his services are appreciated to that degree that he is certain of re-election, he immediately adds the following paragraph:

"I am induced to take this step, Gentlemen, from the settled conviction that I am either wrong in my views as to what would best promote the interests of Peterboro' and the surrounding country, or my opponents so wilfully blind to them, that all future attempts on my part to convince them of their correctness would be time misspent; and therefore the sooner they are left to the management of abler and more disinterested hands the better."

Now, since Mr. Conger feels that he has the confidence of his ward, another direction must be taken to arrive at the source of his discontent. Without any doubt, the result of the late County election furnishes the solution; a matter which to a public man of sound principle, would not be allowed to interfere, beyond its proper limits. It is not because an individual is held to be unequal to the task of regulating the affairs of the Province, that he must therefore also be insufficient for the office of Town Councillor; not at all, the qualifications of mind and education necessary to the two stations are largely distinguished, and Mr. Conger ought not from mere contumacy, because he is judged, on trial, to be unfitted to the higher post, to refuse service in a position he is admitted to be equal to. Such a disposition is an effectual barrier to a man's usefulness to the public; it asserts in the servant, the right of control over the mind of the master, and is a complete contradiction. Another point for consideration, furnished by the passage above quoted, is as to the narrowness of the view Mr. Conger takes, when setting himself up as a candidate for the Legislature. He evidently considers that the local material interests of "Peterborough and surrounding country" embrace the whole purpose of his mission; while, if he had any apprehension, his presence during two sessions, would have explained to him that Parliament had, in the creation of Municipal Corporations, separated itself in a great measure from questions of improvement, which had only a local consequence, and thus confined its action to those great questions which have a general character. Mr. Conger's station is thus ascertained to be within the compass of the Town and County Council.

Let us now pass in review the more important Address, now the property of the Electors of the County of Peterborough in particular, and of the public in general.—First, he announces that a momentary triumph has been obtained in this County, by the "Rouge Republican Clear Grit party," which said party he describes further as being "the worst enemies of Canada." Now, upon the justice of adjudging this character to all or any considerable portion of these electors who cast their votes for Mr. Short, there is much ground for dispute. Whatever Mr. Short may be, is not now the question, but the pot never upbraided the kettle with being black, with less decency than when Mr. Conger reflects upon the political proclivities of Mr. Short's career. They are fellows, and if one desires to establish his claim to distinction apart from the other, he had better not go over too much ground to do so. However, those, with very few exceptions, who voted for Mr. Short, did so under an impulse that drove them in search of somebody who should be made the instrument of keeping out Mr. Conger. It was, not because they admired the man they attached themselves to, but because, intent upon recording their dissatisfaction towards their late representative, they located themselves where a little underbrushing invited their attention. Mr. Short was the queue-bob brought out by a small clique, and the electors swarmed around him, and were hired. This is the simple history of the transaction, and let Mr. Conger cook it up as he likes, he can make nothing better of it; the chances did not suit him, and that is the plain [illegible] of [illegible]

Mr. Conger next advises the Electors that "he has reason to believe that the momentary triumph of Canada's worst enemies will yet be to them a source of defeat." Which means probably that the election will be successfully contested, and a new writ issued, promising a different return. By all means, Mr. Conger, and let the right man have a fresh chance.

Then, Mr. Conger explains that the change of the representation in the County was not the consequence of any change of principle. Certainly not, before a change takes place there must be an existing condition, and as neither Mr. Short nor Mr. Conger are possessed of it in any degree, the word change is not at all applicable to them, or either of them. Interest, is the term, not principle.

Next, Mr. Conger berates the Electors who opposed him, for the injustice of their motives, and the wrong which he suffered by them, when they allowed themselves to be led to record their votes against him. Well, this seems to be rather an inverted proposition. It seems strange that a candidate professing to make great sacrifices in order to serve the people, should complain of an injury when he is relieved making further such sacrifices; but there are paradoxes in politics as in everything else, wheels within wheels, and much in philosophy that man never dreamt of; and probably those apparent sacrifices were more than counterbalanced by some hidden agency from whose action Mr. Conger, when he lost the confidence of the people, became far removed; and therein consits the injury he sustains; but that injury is his misfortune and not a wrong. He is the sufferer at his own risk; when there is no existing right, there can be no wrong; and as Mr. Conger could not continue his service, but with the active assent of his constituency, so he cannnot either complain, when they rejected his kind offers.

The Port Hope "Guide."

Mr. John Sinter Smith, who is the unobserved manager of the editorial department of the Guide, has thought proper, as he says "to put Mr. Sawers in the pillory," commencing with false premises and consequently arriving at false conclusions. Mr. Smith says "about eighteen calendar months ago an ambitious gentlemen of Peterboro', Mr. Sawers by name, was, if his assertions were worthy of belief, a warm admirer of Mr. George Brown;" Mr. Smith then goes on to show what Mr. Sawers thinks of Mr. Brown now; and argues that disappointment at not receiving the support of the Toronto Globe, must be the cause of the change of disposition. For the information of the above Mr. Smith, we have to state, although his confidence in the correctness of his proposition, makes him very particular, as to the measurement of time, that neither eighteen calendar or lunar months ago, was Mr. Sawers an admirer of Mr. Brown, that in fact he never was, and that he looks upon him as one of the great humbugs of the day, just as a quack in medicine, who preys on the legitimate profession, by indulging the prejudices of the unthinking. And if Mr. John Shuter Smith was anything else than a hypocrite himself, he would have hesitated to sail at his election contest, under the banner of a man, of whose motives he has as mean an opinion as Mr. Sawers. But Mr. Smith did so, and did it because of the influence he fancied it should draw in his favor. Mr. Smith is no more a Brownite, at heart, than he is a Mahommedan; all Mr. Smith wanted was, to get into the House, for the purpose of using his vote to bring aid to the schemes he would be interested in. But Mr. Smith, with all his trickery, fell through in his plans; and if he thinks, because more votes were thrown away upon him than upon Mr. Sawers, that therefore he is more respectable, he is quite welcome to his childish delusion.

The Town Elections.

Yesterday, at the respective wards, the election of Councillors for the ensuing year, took place. In the South Ward there were proposed, only Messrs. Elias Burnham, Edmund Poole, and Michael Hogan; they were consequently declared elected by acclamation. The same occurred in the North Ward, the chosen persons being Messrs. David Carlyle, C. Bradfield, and James Harvey. In the Centre Ward were Messrs. James Hall, James Stevenson, W. A. Scott, George Haslehurst, Thos. White the elder, and W. B. Read, and at the close last night their numbers stood:

Scott, 47; Stevenson, 42; Hall, 29; Haslehurst, 24; White, 6; Read 4.

In the East Ward, were Messrs. Daniel Hopkins, William Hall, Christopher Leary and John Kennedy, and at the close last night their numbers were;

Hopkins, 50; Hall, 46; Leary, 40; Kennedy, 27.

The polling in the Centre and East Wards will be continued to-day.

Election Problems.

The Peterborough Review has received from a correspondent, an arithmetical problem, in which he is asked, if a man requires 1,500 votes to attain his object, and commencing with 17, rises 1 every 2 years, at what age will he win? And the Review answers, "Rather older than Methuselah."

Our correspondent, who is also a curious fellow, falling in with the above question and its solution, became quite thrilled with the conceit, and desired us to put the following further proposition to the correspondent of the Review:

If a man of 56, rising much beyond his strength, shoots past the winning post at a wonderful rate; and then, being quite exhausted, loses 213 steps in 2 years, how old will he be when, according to the laws of [illegible] [illegible] he will have gained 1,000? Surely Mr. Conger will not ever [illegible] to perform this feat [illegible]

Lord Bury the Colonist.

In 1854 Lord Bury, the eldest son of the Earl of Albemarle, visited the County of Victoria, with a view of offering himself for that constituency, as their Member in the House of Assembly; but not finding matters suitable to his purpose, he withdrew, and subsequently became Secretary to His Excellency, the Governor General, and was also appointed Superintendent of Indian Affairs. Lord Bury married a daughter of Sir Allan McNab, and recently returned to England, where he now sits in Parliament, as Member for Norwich. In another column will be found the abstract of a lecture, delivered by his lordship, in which he recommends the accrediting by Canada of representative ambassadors, to the Court of St. James, who shall have a voice in purely Imperial matters. We can hardly think his sentiments can be correctly reported, since our absolute dependance on the mother country allows of no grounds for such an establishment. There be a rather prevalent theory in some quarters, and more likely to be the subject of his remarks, which would allow Canada a representation in the Imperial Parliament; but, in view of the expense it would involve, by throwing on the Province the cost of its protection against invasion, and the support of foreign diplomatic relations, it is not at all likely to be asserted to by the people of Canada. As to the making a land route through Canada to the Pacific, there will of course be no objection, if the means are provided by England, but it can hardly yet be counted among the projected experiments of the age.

Launching the Leviathan.

The uncommonly tedious process of compelling this vessel to take to the water was resumed yesterday afternoon, and attended with more successful results than we have lately had to record. In spite of the utmost endeavours which were made to get everything forward in time yesterday morning, it was found impossible to fix the hones of the new hydraulic rams with sufficient strength to warrant the recommencement of work till past 2 o'clock. By that hour, however, all was ready, and the presence of an unusual number of visitors, among whom were their Royal Highnesses the Dukes DeJoinville and D'Aumale, the Marquis of Stafford, Sir Joseph Paxton, Mr. Penn, the dockyard authorities, &c., showed that, notwithstanding the recent mishaps, the confidence and curiosity of the [illegible] were not over. Almost with the first efforts the Leviathan moved slightly and after this her tendency to the water was still more marked than heretofore, the only difference being that she was rather disposed to slip or run away for some distance. During one of the slipping movements, the greatest distance that she has ever shifted at one time took place. Almost directly the rams were applied to her abs with a slow and equal motion for 10 inches, the next time she moved 13 and the third time only one inch. Each of these movements, however was a distinct [illegible]—the mere first start being sufficient to [illegible] her off. Just after she had made the second drop the attention of all in the yard was distracted from the vessel by a most painful accident which took place outside and in which a number of persons were seriously injured by the fall of a scaffolding on which they stood. In order to gratify the curiosity of the crowds who have daily assembled outside the ground a large scaffold was erected between the dead walls of two houses, about fifteen or twenty feet from the ground. On this crazy structure, the very aspect of which was enough to warn prudent people from its vicinity, numbers of visitors have stood all day for the last week. Yesterday it was unusually crowded, upwards of a hundred persons, most of them of the lower classes, being upon it, when suddenly, as the launch began, the whole platform gave way and with its occupants came with a fearful crash to the ground. The cries and screams of those who were hurt, the efforts of the uninjured to extricate themselves, and the rush of the mob outside to the spot for a few minutes made the scene [illegible] of indescribable confusion and alarm. At last comparitive order was restored and the more easily became ascertained of those who had fallen had escaped with and the casualities were ascertained. It was then found that a considerable number had been cut and bruised about the head, face, and body, all more or less severely though fortunately none so much so as to prevent their walking away after a short time. Seven persons, however, were found to be so seriously injured that it was necessary to remove them at once to Poplar Hospital. There they were given into the charge of Mr. Brownfield, the resident surgeon, who immediately best

VISIT OF HER MAJESTY'S STEAM FRIGATE MEDUSA TO HAKODATE AND SIMODA—THE AMERICAN CONSUL GENERAL AT JAPAN, &c. &c.

From the Singapore Free Press, Oct. 21.

The Dutch papers contain an account of a visit made to the harbors of Hakodate and Simoda, in Japan, by Captain Fabius, in the screw corvette "Medusa" in September and October, 1856 of which we shall give some particulars:—

On his arrival at Hakodate, Captain Fabius was visited by an official and a Dutch interpreter, who brought him the harbour regulations in English; he refused them, observing that he did not wish to receive any official document from the Japanese in the English language, seeing that there was a Dutch interpreter's college establishment in Japan, and he requested that the regulations should be furnished in Dutch.

Captain Fabius then requested the interpreter to convey a letter to the Governor, in which he expressed his wish to pay his respects to his Excellency, and asked when it would be convenient to receive him. Captain Fabius desired the interpreter not to translate the letter first, but to take it at once to the Governor and give him a verbal interpretation of it; he at first objected to this, saying it is contrary to custom, but Captain Fabius insisted on it, the interpreter at last agreed to comply with his wishes. In consequence of this letter the Deputy governor and a number of secretaries and other followers soon came on board, with the Governors compliments, and to say that his Excellency would receive Captain Fabius and four of his officers at the Government house on the following morning. They also brought a copy of the harbour regulations in Dutch.

On the following morning Capt. Fabius and officers repaired to the Governor's abode where they were received with much ceremony by the Governor and Deputy Governor, surrounded by a great number of officials. Having taken their seats opposite the Governor, they were offered pipes, tea and sweatmeats.

Compliments and enquiries as to their state of health having been interchanged, the conversation become discursive, and during the intervals of a Japanese breakfast which was served up, turned upon politics, commerce, Russia, the Amoor River, free and restricted trade and the opening of the Japanese empire to all nations in friendship with it. His Excellency appeared to be of opinion that this opening must take place and that it would be impossible to maintain the present system of exclusion much longer. His Excellency having promised to visit the Medusa next day, Captain Fabius mentioned his intention of saluting him, which the Governor requested might not be done, stating he was afraid the fishes might be frightened out of the bay by the noise, to the great grief of the population, who chiefly depend on fishery.

After the audience was ended Captain Fabius and his officers strolled through the town and environs, visiting the temples and shops, and entering some of the houses, asking for lights for their cigars, for water, &c., and were everywhere received with the greatest civility.

Hakodate is a small place, with about 6,000 inhabitants, and lying in a beautiful and safe bay. At present there is little trade, but as soon as the commerce of Japan is free Hakodate will speedily rise in importance from its proximity to Asiatic Russia and the river Amoor. It will then become an emporium for coffee and other colonial products required by Russia, and it will be very advantageous for Holland and her East India possessions to keep this in view and to endeavour to establish a depot there.

On the following day the Governor paid a visit to the Medusa, and remained five hours on board, examining the whole ship and seeing the crew go through some exercises.

Capt. Fabius says that among the things which most excited his surprise, was the progress which the interpreters at Hakodate had already made in acquiring the English language, mixing with their very defective Dutch a number of English words.

The trade of Hakodate with foreigners is at present of very trifling importance.—The supercargo of an American schooner has twice succeeded in bartering some muskets, spyglasses and chronometers for lacquerware, porcelain and soy. Captain Fabius found one of these schooners, the General Pierce belonging to a Dutch firm at Hongkong, at anchor in the bay of Hakodate, trading under the American flag.—The supercargo said that he had come from Simoda, where he sold 3,000 muskets to the Japanese government for fourteen dollars each, and had bought lac-querwork, earthenware and soy, but he had been unable to procure gold, silver or copper. He had disposed of the rest of his cargo, consisting of 3,000 muskets, two chronometers, six telescopes at Hakodate in the same way to the Japanese government, receiving lacquerwork, porcelain and soy. Sulphur and hemp had been offered to him, but at such enormous prices that he could not take them. In other respects he was well content with his barter trade, and praised highly the treatment which he and the crew of his vessel had received both at Simoda and Hakodate. He stated that Simoda had no safe anchorage for vessels of the Medusa's size, and could never therefore become a place of trade.

The Island of Jesso, on which Hakodate is situated, appears to be very fertile; the finest fields of corn are seen in the vicinity of the town, and this part of Japan is said to abound in mines of copper and silver, but they have not yet been worked. Captain Fabius saw some specimens of unusually good coal, which are found here, but the Governor had not yet received authority from Jeddo to work the mines, or to give the coal to foreigners. During a stay of four days the officers were allowed to wander freely about in the town and the neighbourhood with their fowling pieces without the slightest molestation. If they wished to buy anything they entered a shop, settled the price, wrote the name of the purchaser on the article, and it was taken to the custom house, where possession of it could be obtained on paying for it in dollars to a Japanese official.

The [illegible] which was seen at Hakodate, most of it brought from Nagasaki, especially that which is not brought to the Dutch factory there; when brought to Hakodate the price is doubled.

On the 17th the Medusa left Hakodate and continued her voyage along the east of Nipkon to Simoda, but this voyage was found of a very difficult nature. A nearly unknown coast, strong currents, heavy rains, two hurricanes, and defective charts made the voyage tedious and harrassing.

On the 25th September, having arrived at Simoda, Captain Fabius found that the two hurricanes, which he had encountered a few days before, not very far from the coast, had destroyed a great part of Simoda. The rocky shore was strewed with the wrecks of junks, and the houses were all destroyed. These things did not appear much confidence, and induced Capt. Fabius to resolve on making his stay as short as possible, and to keep his steam up. There appeared to be no harbour regulations, and few or none of those tedious formalities which prevail elsewhere in Japan. Captain Fabius sent two letters to the Governor, one requesting an audience, and the other that he might be supplied with coal and water as quickly as possible.

As soon as the Medusa anchored, Capt. Fabius received a visit from Mr. Townsend Harris, the American Consul General, who, a month previously had arrived at Simoda, accompanied by his secretary (a young Dutchman, called Huesken,) and seven Chinese servants. Mr. Harris said he resided in a temple which had been given him; that besides himself and his secretary there was not a European or American at Simoda; there was little or no trade; that the bay or harbor called Simoda, no longer contained any safe anchorage for ships, the earth having been completely torn up by earth and sea quakes and hurricanes; that he had constant difficulties with the Governor, and that about the merest trifles; that he was refused permission to use Japanese money, and was therefore obliged to pay dollars at a most unfavorable exchange, and for the purchase of a single egg the presence of a Japanese officer was necessary, as no one else was permitted to receive dollars; so that, tired out by these matters, he had written to Jeddo to request permission to proceed there, having been empowered by the American government to conclude a new treaty or amend the existing one, and that he should now ask to have commissioners named by the Japanese government to negotiate with him, and in one of the first conferences he should endeavor to have a safe port in the neighborhood of Jeddo or Ozacka substituted for Simoda. The approach of the Deputy Governor being announced, the Consul took his departure, being saluted with eleven guns, and the American flag hoisted at the main.

The Deputy Governor, on arriving on board, welcomed Captain Fabius in the name of the Governor, and announced that his Excellency would be delighted to receive him and his officers on the following morning, and that the Governor was extremely sorry he could not send any refreshments to the crew, everything having been destroyed in the last hurricane.

The next morning the state barge duly made its appearance in charge of a superior officer, but Captain Fabius preferred going in one of his own boats. It was not without considerable reluctance that he left the Medusa, for a light southerly wind having prevailed during the night a very heavy sea had begun to run into the bay, and the Medusa, although anchored in what is called the safest place, had no room to drive, lying close to the rocks and the shore which was covered with wrecks of junks and houses.

The landing place and the so called town, which was not much more than a village, had been nearly wholly destroyed by the last hurricane.

On reaching the shore, Captain Fabius and his officers were met by some officials and two soldiers, who conducted them to the government house, which also bore marks of recent damage. They were then ushered into the great council chamber, where they found the Governor, a second high official, with the rank of Governor, and exercising the office of Commissioner for Foreign Affairs and the Imperial Inspector, sitting on a platform covered with red cloth, before a table with a similar cover. Opposite to this were a long table and a kind of couch or bench, also covered with red cloth, intended for Captain Fabius and his officers, materials for smoking and a number of boxes of sweet-meats being placed before them. Here Captain Fabius and his companions took their seats according to their rank. Between the table of the Governor and that of the Dutch officers another was placed, at which a Japanese official took his seat.

Enquiries for the health of the King of Holland and the Emperor of Japan and other complimentary expressions, having been interchanged, the Dutch officers were invited to partake of the sweet-meats and to smoke, and the conversation then turned on politics, trade, &c., the official sitting between the two tables acting as interpreter, and displaying a much better knowledge of Dutch than Captain Fabius had found in any of the regular interpreters.

The Commissioner for Foreign Affairs put many questions regarding finances, taxation, import and export duties, enterpots, &c., which Captain Fabius answered to the best of his ability, stating at the same time that the Dutch Commissioner has very recently sent a long letter to Jeddo on these points. His Excellency declared that the permitting trade and the formation of commercial treaties were matters of great difficulty for Japan, seeing that Japan possessed so little fitted for the European or American market; that in Japan these articles which, leaving out of view the lacquer ware, were most suitable for the foreign trade were too dear, on account of the high price for labor, and that should the Japanese government allow a great quantity of copper or precious metals to be exported, the mines would soon be exhausted and the country reduced to poverty, as was the case formerly with South America. Captain Fabius observed that there was not much chance the mines would soon become exhausted, but in his opinion there was a want in Japan of skilled persons to work them with advantage. On this account the Dutch government had sent a mining engineer to Nagasaki, to take the mines in hand and instruct the people how to work them to the greatest advantage. The Commissioner highly approved of this, and thought the services of the engineer would be soon availed of.

The Commissioner for Foreign Affairs then asked if there were no countries besides Holland, England, Russia, America and perhaps also France, which desired to trade with Japan, which Captain Fabius answered in the affirmative, remarking that commerce did not retrograde, that industry and the spirit of enterprise was increasing over all the world, and had attained a great height, and knew no bounds or limit; that the late Majesty William II., foreseeing this, and having in view the war of England against China, had then advised Japan like a true friend; and that his present Majesty William III., adopting the policy of his late father, and believing that the rejections of this advice would some time or other involve Japan in great difficulties, and desiring for Holland no exclusive advantages over other nations, but the contrary, and being sincerely anxious to promote the welfare of Japan, still advised that the system which had prevailed for more than two centuries should be abandoned for a more liberal one; that if Japan voluntarily adopted this course, it would be in a position to direct the course of affairs, and would thereby be saved from great sacrifices; but if the Japanese Government remained obstinate, it would soon be forced to make much greater concessions than were at present required of it.—The justness of these remarks appeared to be felt by all the Japanese present.

Captain Fabius was then asked what he thought of Simoda, and replied that he considered it quite entitled for trade as the bay was so very pretty, and not at all unsuitable for merchant ships and he advised the Japanese government now that the anchorage at Simoda had been completely destroyed by earth and seaquakes, to listen to the request of those who wished for another port. He then pointed out the Bay of Hakodate, and said that in his opinion this fine and safe harbour would become of great importance through its vicinity to the rapidly advancing eastern Russia, now in possession of the Amoor river, which ran through a large part of that country, and in connection with which Hakodate would become the emporium for Asiatic Russia for all the productions of India and America, such as coffee, sugar, &c.

The conversation finally turned upon the subject of Consuls, and both Governors inquired what the position of the American Consul was, and how he should be treated seeing that the treaty with America contained nothing but Consuls. Captain Fabius answered that a Consul General such as the American one stationed at Simoda, was always a high functionary and a man of rank, who represented his government, and must protect the interests of those Americans who came to Japan, and see to the proper observances of the treaty; he must, therefore, be treated with distinction suitable to his rank, and being placed by his government in communication with that of Japan and Simoda, he must conform to the matters and usages which were not contrary to his honor and religion and that on the other hand he had a right to enjoy such priveleges as were not inconsistent with the interests of Japan or the Japanese population. Yes, said the Governor, but he wishes to pay for what he requires in our money, and not through the medium of the Japanese officers, in dollars and we say that, according to the treaty, he must pay in dollars; and as no Japanese, who is not specially authorized, can receive dollars, he must purchase everything he requires through the officers appointed for the purpose. Captain Fabius pointed out the hardships of requiring the Consul, whenever he wished to procure a fowl or an egg to buy it through the intervention of a Japanese officer, and remarked that, as far as he knew the American treaty, the provision about the payment in dollars only applied to persons visiting Japan temporarily such as seamen, and not to those like the American Consul General who was established at Simoda, who ought to have the right of purchasing what he required without the interference of a Japanese official. A long discussion ensued on this point, and the reasonableness of Captain Fabius' observations was at last agreed to.

The Japanese officials then adverted to what had been said by Captain Fabius regarding usages inconsistent with the honor or religion of others, and asked what he meant by this. He took the opportunity in answering to advert to the trampling on the cross—as being a Japanese usage offensive to every Christian—as showing a hostile disposition on a subject on which they cherished their most sacred feelings, and in which they not only mutually accorded freedom of worship, but in which there was an established usage that there should be nothing in the practice of their religion which could give offence to others.

During these prolonged discussions a capital dinner in the native style was served up, which the two Governors joined in partaking. Afterwards it was arranged that the Governors should pay a visit to the Medusa, and they requested that there should be practice with the great guns as well as with musketry, to which Captain Fabius gave a ready assent. Capt. Fabius having asked for a supply of rice, the Governor besought him to make his indent as small as possible, as nearly all the supply had been destroyed by the hurricane, and the quantity having been reduced two-thirds, the Governor expressed his obligation for the consideration shown.

On the following morning the Japanese officials visited the vessel and partook of a collation, in the course of which they particularly relished the coffee and champagne. A long conversation, lasting some hours, took place, and many topics were discussed.—Presents were interchanged and the Medusa inspected, the crew exercised with small arms and a salute of seventeen guns fired. After the departure of the guests the accounts were settled and paid in Mexican dollars. The anchor was then weighed and the Medusa proceeded outside. Capt. Fabius remarks that he was truly glad to leave Simoda on account of its unsafe anchorage.

The Victoria Bridge at Montreal

From the Canadian News, publisher in London, December 9th.

We have the pleasure of offering to our subscribers, as a supplement to this day's publication, a view of what has not been inappropriately designated the greatest engineering work of modern times.

The Victoria Bridge is tubular, and is built on the principle of the Britannia Bridge, which spans the Menai Straits, near Bangor.

It will, we believe, be, when finished, the longest bridge in the world—its length from bank to bank being only 176 feet less than two miles.

The Menai bridge is 1,880 feet long. The Victoria Bridge is, therefore, nearly five and a half times longer; or to illustrate its length by an example familiar to most English persons—Waterloo Bridge, London: This structure is 1,362 feet long. It would, consequently, require a little more than seven and a half times its length to measure distance with its Canadian brother.

The place where it crosses the St. Lawrence is about half a mile to the westward of Montreal, a short distance below the "Lachine" rapids, and about nine miles from St. Anne's, the place immortalized in Moore's Canadian Boat Song.

There will be twenty-four piers, which with the two abutments (the northern abutment is that which is visable on the view,) will leave twenty-five spaces or spans for the tubes. The centre span will be 330 feet wide, and each of the other spans will be 242 feet. The width of each of the piers, except the two at the centre, will be fifteen feet. The two centre piers will each be eighteen feet wide. This difference is very evident in the beautiful model of the bridge, which now forms a prominent object of attraction in the Canadian department of the Crystal palace at Sydenham. This model (the length of which is thirty-two feet) has been made in every part exactly to scale; it is, therefore, a truthful representation, in miniature, of the actual structure.

The western faces of the piers—that is, those towards the current (which flows here at a rate varying from 7 to 10 miles an hour)—terminate in a sharp-pointed edge, and the fore-part of each pier present two beautifully smooth bevelled-off surfaces. They are so shaped in order that the least possible resistance may be offered to the avalanches of ice that come along at the departure of winter, and that would hurl away every impediment, less solid than massive rock, that might be opposed to their progress. For it should be remembered that, not only is the whole length of the St. Lawrence, from its first receipt of Lake water at Kingston to tidal water at Quebec—a distance of 360 miles—solidly frozen over in winter; but the 2,000 miles of lake and upper river, together with the tributaries of the St. Lawrence (one of which—the Ottawa—has herself tributaries, several of which exceed the Thames in length, depth, and in volume of water,) likewise send down their debacle that season, all to aggregate in the immediate vicinity of Montreal. The "piling" of the ice to sometimes as high as thirty, forty, and even fifty feet, and on several occasions great damage has been done by it to the massive stone buildings which line the quays, and form the noble river front for which this city is celebrated.

The stone used in the construction of the piers and abutments is a dense blue limestone, partly obtained from a quarry at Point Claire, on the Ottawa, eighteen miles above Montreal, and partly on the borders of Vermont, United States, about forty miles from Montreal. The piers stand on the solid rock, and each contains quite two thousand cubic feet of masonry. Those to support the centre tubes will contain about 9,000 cubic feet each.

The total amount of masonry in the bridge will be about 3,000,000 cubic feet, which, at thirteen and a half feet to the ton, gives a total weight of about 222,000 tons.

Scarcely a block of stone used in the piers is less than seven tons weight, and many of those exposed to the force of the breaking up ice weigh fully ten tons. The blocks are bound together, not only by the use of the best water cement, but each stone is clamped to its neighbors, in several places, by massive iron rivets, bored several inches into each block, and the interstices between the rivet and the block are made one solid mass by means of molten lead.

At the present time fourteen of the piers are completed; eight (including the two centre ones) will be finished next year, leaving only two to erect in 1859.

The piers hitherto constructed have stood "firm as a rock." Had it been otherwise, and that the mighty St. Lawrence had conquered the combined appliances above stated, there would then, indeed, have been an end to all mechanical resistance.

Each of the abutments is 242 feet long and ninety feet wide. The north shore of the St. Lawrence is connected with the northern abutment by an embanked causeway, faced with solid masonry towards the current, 1,400 feet in length. The causeway, from the south bank of the river to the southern abutment, will be 700 feet long. The distance of this outer or river end of the abutment to the outer end of the other is 3,000 feet.

The clear height of the ordinary summer level of the St. Lawrence above the under surface of the centre tube will be sixty feet, and the height will diminish towards either side with a gradient of the rate of 1 in 130, or forty feet in the mile, so that at the outer or river edge of each abutment the height will be only thirty-six feet above the summer level.

The navigation of the river through the Lachine Rapids is limited to steam vessels only, and they will pass exclusively between the two centre piers, as the river is unsuited for navigation at the site of the bridge, except between these two points.

The tubes will be nineteen feet high at each end, whence they will gradually increase to 22 feet 6 inches in the centre. The width of each tube is to be sixteen feet, or nine inches wider than the rail track, which is nine feet six inches, the national railway guage of Canada.

The total weight of iron in the tubes will be 10,400 tons. They will be bound and riveted together precisely in the same manner and with the same machinery as at the Britannia Bridge. That tube connecting the northern abutment with pier No. 1 is now completed. The material for the second tube has reached Canada, and preparations are in progress for the despatch from England, of eight more tubes, so as to ensure their erection during the summer.

Mr. Robert Stephenson and Mr. A. M. Ross are the engineers of this great work. The latter gentleman, having completed his duty as Engineer-in-Chief of the Grand Trunk Railway, now directs his skill and attention exclusively to this structure. The contractors are Messrs. Peto, Brassey and Betts. The bridge will cost about £1,250,000.

As regards the commercial importance of the Victoria Bridge, Mr. Robert Stephenson, in a report addressed to the directors in May, 1854, says:

"The great object, however, of the Canadian system of railways is not to compete with the River St. Lawrence, which will continue to accommodate a certain portion of the traffic of the country, but to bring those rich provinces into direct and easy connection with all the ports on the east coast of the Atlantic, from Halifax to Boston, and even New York, and consequently through these ports near to Europe.

"If the line of railway communication be permitted to remain severed by the St. Lawrence, it is obvious that the benefits which the system is calculated to confer upon Canada must remain, in a great extent, nugatory, and of local character.

"The Province will be comparatively insulated and cut of from that coast to which her commerce naturally tends; the traffic from the West must either continue to adopt the water communication, or, what is more probable—nay, I should say certain,—it would cross into the United States by those lines nearly completed to Buffalo, crossing the river near Niagara."

There can be no doubt that without the Victoria Bridge the large and comprehensive traffic system involved in the construction of the Grand Trunk Railway could only be partially and, by comparison, inefficiently carried out at a very great cost. Montreal is the terminal point of the ocean navigation, and is connected with the Lower St. Lawrence on one side, and with the great Canadian and American lakes, extending 2,000 miles into the heart of the continent, on the other. It is now the centre from which lines of railway now radiate to Portland, Boston, and New York, and to which lines will converge from the Ottawa, and the other rich, though as yet only partially developed, districts of Canada. It is, therefore, the conviction of those persons most capable of forming a sound judgment on the question, that, great as is the cost of the bridge, by means of it a better, more rapid, and cheaper communication will be afforded for the produce of the magnificent districts of Western Canada and of the North-western States of America, including Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, &c., to the Atlantic seaboard, and for the supply of these districts with imported goods, than by any other route on the American continent.

We shall give as a supplement to our next publication a Diagram, which will show the great amount of work done on the bridge up to the 1st instant.

Dr. Hurt's Escape from Utah.

The following, an extract from a letter from Dr. Hurt, the Indian Agent, narrating his escape from Utah territory, was addressed to Col. Johnston, commanding the Utah expedition:—

Sir,—Having recently fled from the Indian settlement on Spanish Fork, in the Territory of Utah, somewhat precipitately, and reached your command on Oct. 23, after wandering for 27 days through mountains and deserts, with Utah Indians, I venture to trouble you with a brief statement of circumstances which induced me to abandon the agency and entrust my life to the care and protection of the savages.

For some time previous to my departure, it had been the settled opinion of the people of Utah, that the troops could not get further than Green River this season. Consequently, I concluded that the Territorial officials would not venture to cross the mountains before Spring; and under the embarrassed condition in which the retention of the mails, and the very unsettled state of Governmental relation, with Utah, had placed me, I deemed it important to seek an interview with them before the winter set in; and as I had been previously advised that no person would be allowed to leave the territory, or cross the mountains, without the humiliating ceremony of applying to Brigham Young for a passport, the alternative of organising an Indian escort suggested itself to my mind—the first conception of which grew out of the deep concern which these untutored creatures had for some time manifested for my safety.

On the morning of Sept. 27, while I was yet discussing the propriety of this resolution, some half dozen of the natives rushed into my office exclaiming "Friend, the Mormons kill you!" and pointed to the window on the Eastern side of the house. On looking out, to my surprise I saw from 70 to 100 armed dragoons stationed in the road, about a mile from the house; and as I did not manifest quite so much concern as the Indians thought the occasion justified, they caught hold of me and gave me to understand that they would not let me stay any longer.

The Indians would not quit my room, but began to gather up my bedding and wearing apparel. I determined to extricate myself or die in the attempt, and turned to ask some one to bring my horse; but when I reached the door, I found that the Chief's son, a sprightly boy, had already performed that service. While he was saddling him, I gathered my papers and wearing apparel, threw them into some meal sacks, and pitched them out of doors to the Indians, who all seemed eager to assist me in my escape. In the presence of an armed populace, I set out with three Indian youths. Joseph P. Watters, of Salt Lake City, also accompanied me. Instead of going east, as our enemies expected, we took a western course, but when it was discovered that we intended to reach the mountains by a circuitous route, some half dozen persons, on horseback, came out of the town of Payson, to stop our course, just ahead of us.

At the distance of about two miles, we reached the base of a low mountain, sweeping north and south. We gained its summit just as the sun was setting, and debated the propriety of pursuing further in a westerly course; but just as one thing, a dispatch was brought to us by two boys, from the old chief, telling us to be sure to return to the farm that night. Under the circumstances, we determined to try a feint. We descended below the summit, only far enough to hide ourselves, and then turned North, and continued on that course for five or three miles, until we thought our pursuers were almost upon the top of the mountain. Then we turned East, and then South, and ascended into a little hollow, where we waited for daylight to disappear. This completely foiled our enemies, for the ground was so hard and stony that they could not discover our trail.

When the half glorious moon began to shine upon the mountain plain, we ascended and threaded over the pinnacle around the spot from which we had set out. We reached the farm at eight p. m., and found about one hundred of our red friends awaiting our return, who manifested great joy at our arrival.

Taking some bread and meat that we found in the cellar, we made our escape that night up the Spanish Fork, in the direction of the Uintra country, and before ten o'clock the next day had placed ourselves beyond the reach of our enemies. Before sunset, all my papers, clothes, &c., were put in my possession. Hence I have been entirely dependant upon those poor untutored children of nature for life and sustenance. I have shared a liberal portion of their meagre hospitalities and crude sympathies; and though they were evidently conscious that they were unable to bestow on me the treatment to which I had been accustomed, they have manifested a devotion to my person and a regard for my safety, in advance of their present knowledge of Christian civilization.

A PULL FOR LIFE.—The crew of the Anna Margaretta, of Leith, arrived at Hartlepool in a small boat, on Wednesday morning, in a most exhausted condition, having lost their vessel on the previous evening, under the following circumstances: The master reported that the vessel had left Leith for Bordeaux, with a cargo of coal and wine, on the 6th instant. All went on well until Tuesday evening, when the cabin boy went down for some article, and found to his surprise that the cabin floor was covered with water, and some articles were floating about. He immediately gave the alarm, and the pumps were set to work, the crew laboring with a hearty good will to get the water under. The vessel at this time was about eight miles off Hartlepool, the lighthouse bearing N. W. and her head standing to the land. The wind was fresh, and a still breeze was blowing from the south-east. The crew made the most strenuous exertions to overcome the water, but their efforts were unavailing. The night was very dark, and a light was hung out for assistance but none came.—Finding that the leak was gaining upon them, and there was no chance of making Hartlepool, as the tide was on the ebb, the crew took to the only boat on board, a small one. They were unable to bring away any of their clothing, and only the log-book was saved. On getting about 300 yards from the vessel, she gave a heavy lurch, and fell over on the port side. With a strong tide, and the darkness against them they made their way to Hartlepool, wearied by their six hours' rowing, rendered all the more arduous from the smallness of the boat, which there was great danger of pulling under the heavy seas. The poor cabin boy was kept bailing the boat during the whole of six hours, the sea coming into the boat continually. The crew were promptly attended to by the agent of the Shipwrecked Mariner's Society, and sent home.

MR. MASSEY, M. P., AT SALFORD.—Mr. Massey, Member for Salford, and Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, met his constituents in the Town Hall, on Thursday. In the course of a speech on India he warmly eulogized the conduct of the British in that country, and glorified their recent victories. There was an end, he said, to the ancient dynasty of India, and upon its ruins, he believed would be securely founded the throne of our British Queen; and if the ascendency of Britain was of the greatest importance to Europe, was it not of infinitely more importance to the people of India; for any regeneration that Asia could receive in religion must come from the British nation? Mr. Massey also referred to the promised Reform Bill; but when he said he knew no more about it than his audience, he was met by hisses, and the meeting broke up in confusion.

☞ The Kingston News of Monday says, "we regret to learn that Mrs. Macdonald, wife of the Hon. J. A. Macdonald died yesterday afternoon, after a long and painful illness. Mr. Macdonald was sent for on Friday in consequence of her alarming condition, and reached this city on the same day.

DERIVATION OF THE WORD "SEPOY."—The name Sepoy, or Sipoy, is derived by Bishop Heber, from "sip," the bow and arrow, which were originally in almost universal use by the native soldiers in India in offensive warfare. The Sepoys are well trained in European discipline—of a size somewhat less indeed, than the European soldier, but quite as brave, as hardy, and as active, capable of undergoing as much fatigue, and of sustaining even greater privations. "To the attachment and bravery of this army" says a writer in the Penny Cyclopædia, in 1841, "Great Britain is chiefly indebted for the possession of her Indian empire; and it now secures to her the disputed sovereignty over a dominion vastly more extensive than her own, and separated from her by the distance of nearly one half the globe."

Lord Bury, M. P., on Canada.

A lecture was delivered on the 24th ult. at St. Andrew's Hall, on behalf of the Norwich Christian Young Men's Association, by Viscount Bury, M. P., on Canada. The Mayor in the Chair.

Lord Bury said:—Ladies and gentlemen, I feel that I come before you to-day under some disadvantages, and I must throw myself on your indulgence for a favorable construction of what I have to say. It would be impossible within the short limits of a lecture to notice all the topics which would naturally fall under the head of the social and political condition of Canada. The extraordinary point with regard to Canadian prosperity is not the prosperity itself, but the rapidity with which it has been attained and the steady perseverance with which it has been brought. I shall dwell very little on results: I shall only have time to bring under your notice the process by which a few poor emigrants and their descendants have, in the space of a few generations, raised themselves, with no other help than that of their own labor and intellect, to a social, commercial and political condition, equal to that of the old states of Europe, and far surpassing them in the certainty of the rewards held out to talent and industry. After describing the early history and the settlement of the North American continent and the general features of the country, the lecturer said, the large majority of emigrants had heretofore gone by way of New York.—Ships clearing out for Canadian ports usually went out in ballast, and the price of their freight home had to remunerate them for their journeys. Properly organised emigration would not only render it more accessible to those who had not now sufficient capital to emigrate, but would materially improve the condition of the Canadian carrying trade.

Canada for able-bodied men and women would relieve the people of England of an immense body of persons, who must steal, starve, or go to the workhouse, and would supply Canada with the bone and sinew which were alone wanting to enable her to compete successfully with all the difficulties that beset her. The Government had set apart Crown lands in the district of the Ottawa, which would be granted free to any man willing to comply with the few conditions with which the gift was saddled. These briefly were—to take possession of the land within one month, and bring twelve acres of it into cultivation within one year—to reside on that lot till the settlement duty was performed, and to build a house 20 feet by 18. The excellent municipal system accustomed the people to the use of the elective principle in everything: the suffrage was almost universal, there being a £6 franchise in towns and £4 in the rural districts, and the system of voting open, as in England. The United States were popularly supposed to be the ne plus ultra of rapid increase in every kind of prosperity. Canada, however, equalled or surpassed them in all. There was not an old inhabitant of Toronto and Hamilton in Canada, who could not give instances of property now worth thousands, being bought 20 years ago for a day's labour, or half a barrel of whiskey, or even a pair of boots. In 1855, there were in Canada four universities, six colleges, sixty-six grammer schools—in all, 8,710 educational establishments—[illegible] 240,000 pupils and students, and supported mostly by [illegible] tary rates. The general social condition of Canada closely corresponded with our own; it was England's nearest colony, possessed a healthy climate, land easily attainable, taxation was 85 per cent cheaper than in England, and religion perfectly free. There was a constant demand, and good wages, for skilled and unskilled labour. We could not expect this great, well educated, and increasing country to be always what we understand by the word colonies. An integral part of the Empire they would be happy to remain, but if once they found themselves in a position in which they could make themselves a greater name, or be in fact more independent by separation than by remaining united with us, they would go. This was a matter which involves the greatness of England, for it could not be denied that England's greatness depends upon her colonies. Our present Colonial system was a mere makeshift, not a real solution of the question—what ought our colonial policy to be? Neither party had full and even justice; the colony submitted to continued inferiority, and the State bore the whole burden of the protection which the colony enjoyed. We had to deal with people of our own flesh and blood, who prized an alliance only upon equal dependence, even upon Great Britain, no people of English race would long brook. He would recommend that the colonies should have representative ambassadors in this country, who should have a voice in purely imperial matters, and secure, as ambassadors from foreign nations do, that social status for the natives of the country whence they came to which they might be entitled by their position at home. The possessors of the direct route for trade to the East had in all ages been masters of the world. We possessed India, but the only access to it which was really in our power was round the Cape. He need not stop to persist that Suez was unsafe, and we had it in our power to open out through British territory a safe and speedy road. It was no longer the dream of a visionary that the railroad, the ship canal, and the telegraph might, even in time of men now living, run from the Atlantic to the Pacific. This was the only route that would render us independent of the intrigues of Russia, or, if such existed, of France. It was the shortest way to Australia and China, and the only invulnerable approach to India; it would give to British trade a national direction; it would increase the demand for shipping both in the Atlantic and the Pacific; it would turn the trade of British America, now more and more tending towards the United States, into an imperial channel; it would raise the empire of England to the proud position of the most self-contained and the most glorious confederation ever formed by war or commerce.

At the conclusion of the lecture, which was received throughout with loud applause, a vote of thanks to Lord Bury and the Chairman was carried by acclamation, and the meeting separated

A CANADIAN TAKEN IN BY CONFIDENCE MEN.—On Saturday morning Mr. Irwin Moore of Toronto, Canada, was accosted at the St. Nicholas Hotel, where he was stopping, by a rather well dressed young man who pretended that he was an old acquaintance. Mr. Moore was somewhat pleased with the fellow's address, and forthwith entered into conversation with him. The new acquaintance seemed well posted up relative to matters in Canada, and succeeded in making Mr. Moore believe that he was well acquainted with his (Moore's) family. From the front stoop, where the acquaintance was formed, the two repaired to the bar-room to drink each other's health, and that it was his intention to go South and spend the remainder of the Winter there, "I declare," said the stranger, "I am glad I met you for I am going South for the benefit of my health, and we can go together and have such a gay time." "When are you going?" said the stranger, "This afternoon," replied Mr. Moore. "Good, good," says the stranger, "if that ain't good I hope to die. I am going this very afternoon myself." "Have you engaged your passage," asked the stranger? "Not yet," said Mr. Moore, "I am going down to the office presently." "That's just the ticket," remarked the stranger, "We'll go down together and engage one state room, and have a fine time by ourselves." Then the half hour or so was passed in conversation, Mr. Moore becoming more and more pleased with the acquaintance. Having finished their cigars the stranger asked Mr. Moore if he would not like a walk down with him as he wanted to settle some little bills before leaving the city. The

ELLIS'S PATENT ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its Beauty.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its Durability.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its Cheapness.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICK IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed (post-paid) to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

English Squatters.—The Gipsies in the New Forest.

In the New Forest, Hants, serious evils emanate from a class of individuals denominated squatters. These persons have, by virtue of a long existing custom and usage, established themselves as separate and distinct colonies, which are extensively distributed throughout the waste.

It is an ancient admitted plea of justification for a perpetual tenancy that if a family can erect a house and occupy the same, free from all the ill effects of wind and weather, within a space of 24 clear hours, they become, by virtue of such an accomplishment, tenants in fee of the ground they stand upon, and are suffered thenceforth to enjoy the same as a perpetual freehold.

From this circumstance, either with a view to progo. a spirit of social accomodation, or to secure from external annoyance united support, or both, these people have been progressively encroaching from time immemorial on this sylvan waste, until they have ultimately succeeded in constructing villages, which they are pleased to term towns, in which they multiply in numbers and in crime.

Being proximate to the coast, immediately opposite the port Cherbourg, and in close connection and constant communication with the Channel Islands, the New Forest presents a most eligible theatre for the encouragement of smuggling, and the greatest portion of the inmates of these mud-built wigwams are more or less in the practice of carrying on an unceasing trade in contraband wares. This lawless practice, combined with deer-stealing, and poaching on an unlimited scale, may be looked upon as the chief resources of the villages under consideration. Some years ago there was a notorious deer-stealer, named Jem Dible who occupied a hut in "deer-ending town," near Wyvelly Lodge, the residence of one of the forest-keepers of the name of Toomer. This is the person who once succeeded in tutoring a pig he had in his possession to perform the duties of a sporting dog. The porcine quadruped would gallop by the sides of hedges, through stubble or heath, and wherever he scented fur or feather, would come to a dead stand, and maintain his position as stiff as the staunchest pointer. The pig Toomer had been for years, for his good services, spared from the murderous knife of the butcher, so that he might be said to have "saved his bacon." Jem Dible was no less than fifty times incarcerated in Winchester gaol, for longer or shorter terms of imprisonment. He was the most notorious poacher of the day, and has left a name behind him that will go down with posterity for ages to come in the legendary annals of "feats of the forest."

From Dible's school sprang up a race of similar character, unequalled by the "Waltham blacks" for their daring intrepidity. They spread terror in the neighborhood around. Nor were their pursuits directed to deer-stealing and poaching alone; the farmers' houesteads were assailed by these nocturnal depredators.—Poultry, sheep and pigs came alike to them; in fact, they made a trade of their daring ingenuity; and have been known to have succeeded, without a shadow of suspicion attached to them, of disposing of joints of mutton to the farmers' wives in the vicinity which formed a part and parcel of the very sheep that, 24 hours before were grazing on their husbands' lands.

A very remarkable instance of detection, in relation to one of the Dibble's, on the score of sheep-stealing, may proved interesting in detail. It happened in the month of December, Mr. Cole of Bucklands, lost a sheep off his farm during the night, the animal had been killed on the spot on which it was feeding, and the skin and garbage were abandoned to a ditch hard by. Cole, on discovering his loss, ordered his horse to be saddled, and started off to Rhinefield Lodge, the keeper of which, one Bumpstead, kept a brace of highly-trained bloodhounds, which were used for redeeming the red deer that were frequently apt to stray away beyond the forest bounds. These dogs were conveyed in a cart to the field in which the depredation had been committed and laid on to the foot track of the perpetrator of the theft, accompanied by Bumstead, Mr. Cole and his son. The scent was quickly acknowledged by the canine retrievers; they drifted their way at an even space, over a wild heath, a cold fallow, through a coppice, crossed the high road at Garlington Road, through a turnip field, over a stubble, into the high road again, on to Arnewood farm, run the length of a mile towards Batchley, when they entered the forest, and uninterruptedly entered Deer-ending-town, when they opened with the stentorian salute of "We have found." On the parties entering the premises, in a shed behind the house was the mutton, cut up ready for retail purposes. The man Dible was so struck with the novel mode of his apprehension that he credulously fancied the devil had a hand in the whole transaction, and, falling on his knees, implored mercy from God and man for the criminal act he had committed. He was, however, visited with the usual punishment attendant upon such a feature of felony at the following assizes, held at Winchester.

But, although the New Forest has been for a long course of years the parent of crime of a like character, nevertheless it may be somewhat anomalous in the scale of truth, that the gipsies, who are numerous in these parts, are seldom if ever known to trespass upon the possessions of the farmer. These roving tribes are looked upon in the light of the guardians of the housekeeper, rather than pilferers or plunderers. The farmer feels more satisfied when the gipsies encamp near his residence than when they are away. He is safe from the encroachments of his more furtive neighbors, for the Sybillines fraternity are invariably accompanied by a kennel of ruffians, impotient lears, which give alarm at the slightest sound of approach on the part of any stranger advancing towards them; these watch-dogs give the signal for an immediate look-out, so that no person can escape the vigilant observation of the staff of the camp.

The Lees, the Coopers, and the Stanleys have, from time immemorial, visited the different farms in the neighborhood of their Sylvan encampment every year. They on their arrival announce their presence by personally waiting on the farmers at their residences: generally begging of the latter a few trusses of straw, which constitute the chief of their bed furniture. This boon is invariably afforded them, and in such faith is the bond of reciprocal accommodation observed that, if any one of the tribe should under any circumstances, betray the trust reposed in them by committing a depredation on a neighboring farmer who has befriended them with their necessary wants, that individual is, after undergoing a judicial ceremony, reproved by the whole community and ultimately expelled from the tribe he belonged to, abandoned as an exile and an outcast.

A singular instance of this kind occurred about twenty-five years ago, at a place called Bolton Bench, in the Forest. It happened that a young gipsey had been guilty of some act which was repugnant to the general understanding of the tribe. He was removed to a spot a short distance from the camp, and there surrounded by the whole of the brethren each member having a branch of oak in his or her hand. He was then commanded by the King, who had assembled the council, to walk slowly round the human circle within arms length of the circumstationed group. During this preambulatory exposure he received a stroke from the branches that the men and women were provided with. A vessel of dirty water was then soused over him, and he was suffered to beat a hasty retreat from the camp.

Joseph Lee was the patriarchal monarch of the gipsies, on the above occasion. He was 87 years of age when he died, having by hook or crook, as the saying goes, lumped together a tidy personal estate; for according to the accredited reckoning of the gipsey court of "testamentary commins," he left behind him no less a sum than six thousand pounds sterling. He had three daughters, whom he severally named "Faith," "Hope," and "Charity." On Charity Lee, his youngest daughter, being married to a young man of the Stanley tribe, it is stated that he presented to the bridegroom £300 worth of plate and jewelry, and 200 sovereigns, and to his daughter, the bride, four New Forest ponies and a saddle and bridle. The gipsies are the least offensive features that are to be met with in the New Forest of Hampshire.

Independent of the great gain that would speedily follow in the wake of bringing this long neglected waste into a state of cultivation, the government would, at one sweep, sap the foundations of this Babel of crime and its contingencies, thereby admitting the flood-gates of civilization to be opened and the back waters of sound knowledge and moral example to find their way into the hearts of its degraded and depraved inhabitants.—Corr. Mark Lane Express.

SUFFERING.—The Buffalo Times says that the applicants for charity, so far, this winter treble the number of last year, and misery keeps on increasing. We do not know where it will stop, for we have not half passed through our winter yet, and the bitterest cold and the deepest snow is yet to come. The plans for general relief are, though not complete, excellent, and the aid afforded very great indeed. Those noble souls who in such seasons "love their neighbors as themselves," have not only a reward in an approving conscience here, but in surety hereafter.

The Details.

GENERAL SUMMARY.

From the Bombay Times, November 27.

Brigadier Grant's column, about 3,500 strong, reached Cawnpore on the 26th, and, being reinforced to 5,000, crossed the Ganges with a large convoy of supplies for Lucknow, on the 30th. They reached Alumbagh without obstruction on the 3rd, but they waited till the Commander-in-Chief should join them. Sir Colin Campbell left Calcutta on the 27th October, and, having narrowly escaped being made captive on his way, arrived at Cawnpore on the 3rd November, and remained there until the 9th, waiting, it is presumed, for further reinforcements, which must probably have accompanied him, to the extent of from 2,000 to 3,000, bringing up the force at Alumbagh, when he joins, to close on 10,000 men. Lucknow is said to be surrounded by about 40,000 insurgents, against whom Outram and Havelock gallantly, but with difficulty, held their own with less than 2,000 men. For the past six weeks they have been isolated, and scarcely a line in that time has been received from them.—Heavy fighting, with great slaughter, is believed to have occurred. Col. Powell, while advancing with a party of 800 men was obstructed on the 1st by the Dinapore mutineers, betwixt Futtehpore and Cawnpore, when an action ensued, in which we were triumphant, but with severe loss, Col. Powell being amongst the killed, Nynee Tal, for a time invested by the enemy, had been relieved. Mohidpore, having been attacked on the 8th by a body of insurgent tribes from the neighborhood, a portion of the United Malwa Contingent joined the enemy, killed Captain Mills and Dr. Carey, Serjeant-Majors O'Connell and Mannos, captured the guns and compelled the other troops to retire. Brigadier Stewart, who left Dhar on the 8th, is now rapidly advancing to the northward, and will by this time, we have no doubt, have given a good account of as many of the mutineers as can be overtaken. Great masses of troops continue pouring in from all directions, and the country in every where returning to a state of tranquility.—The Governor-General and Governors of Madras are at the respective seats of their administration. The Commander-in-Chief of India has by this time reached Lucknow. Sir Patrick Grant is at Madras, and Sir Henry Somerset at Poonah.

BRIGADIER GRANT'S COLUMN.

At the date of our last, Colonel Greathed's column, after the battle of Agra, on the 10th of October, were pushing on with all haste to Cawnpore, where they expected to arrive on the 27th. On the 18th Brigadier Grant, of the 9th Lancers, joined and took command in room of Colonel Greathed. Taking them up where we left them at Mynpoorie on the 19th we now pursue an account of the march. Halting for a day on the 20th, they reached Bewar on the 21st, and recovered the treasure—about £23,000—left there when the mutiny broke out in May. The fort, with all the buildings it contained, was blown up. After a long march of 24 miles they reached Goorsahaigunge on the 22nd. On the 24th, they arrived at Kanouj, where a portion of the Delhi fugitives, on their way to Futtelghur, had established themselves.—On discovering the approach of our troops, a body of 300 of them, with five guns, endeavoured to escape in the direction of Oude. Two hundred of the 9th Lancers, with a body of native cavalry, the 15th Irregulars, were immediately despatched in pursuit, when, heavy firing being heard, Grant followed with a second squadron and a couple of guns. The enemy had attempted to form on crossing the Kalee Nuddee (black river), and fired at our Cavalry.—On our guns opening, they decamped, our troopers crossing the stream, and following them. They were now shut up between the Ganges and the lesser stream, where about two hundred of them were cut up—the remainder escaped into the fields. The guns were captured, two of them being our own. A few, both of the cavalry and Sepoys, were drowned in endeavoring to swim the Ganges. Lieutenant Watson and two native troopers were slightly wounded.—The force once more pushed on, and reached Cawnpore on the morning of the 26th October.

HOLILCUND.—SHOWERS'S COLUMN.

We mentioned in our last that the flying column under Brigadier Showers, having swept the country around Delhi, started afresh on the 2nd of October, and were last heard of at Jaffoo Satar, on the 12th.—Here the horsemen of the Nawab of Jhujjur, who had crossed the river, were disarmed without resistance. In the fort they found twenty-one guns, with a considerable supply of gunpowder and munitions of war, a large number of horses and elephants, and 30,000 stand of arms. The chief himself was captured on the 17th, in his hunting-grounds at Chowenkwas. Information was now received that the Goojurs had fallen back on Rewaree, with a view of plundering the cities. Hodson's horse, which had just joined, now dashed back, overtook, and cut about 40 of them to pieces. A party of the Guide Cavalry next surprised Nahur, endeavoured to prevent the fugitives from reaching the fort of Kanoud, and cut up all they overtook. A squadron of the Carabineers, with Hodson's force, were afterwards sent out in the same direction, under Colonel Custance, with the view of obtaining possession of the fort before it was reached by the enemy. Brigadier Showers himself, with the main column, followed as speedily as he could, and reached the place on the 20th, when they found Col. Custance, who had arrived the day before, in possession. The garrison, who had not been reinforced, surrendered at once; £50,000 worth of treasure in rupees, with 14 guns, and a quantity of stores were captured. About 500 of the garrison, said to be Poorbeahs, had fled during the night, and 60 who remained laid down their arms. Here the force rested awhile, to recover from their recent violent exertions. They had during the previous fortnight secured upwards of £70,000 worth of treasure. They started again on the 22nd. On the 31st a detachment of Showers' column went in pursuit of a body of Mewatte and other insurgents, who had taken up a position on the heights near Sonuh, in the Ghoorgaon district. The rebels were dispersed with the loss of about 100 killed. In this affair Mr. W. Clifford, of the civil service, was killed by a shot from the enemy.

AGRA.

On the 27th of October Col. Cotton, with a body of troops, made a forced march from Agra towards Futteypore-Sekree, where a large body of the Indore fugitives were said to be assembled. The force consisted of 200 of the Engineer Brigade, three light field battery guns, two 8-inch howitzers, a detachment of Sikh cavalry and infantry, under the command of Lieut. Sheriff, and the militia cavalry. They reached their destination on the morning of the 28th, but found that the bulk of the enemy had decamped during the night. A few desperate men still held a very strong position in the Tehseldaree and buildings around. After a short bombardment, a 9-pounder was brought to bear on the eastern gate, when the troops burst in and stormed the place. Twelve men were killed inside, and five cut up by the cavalry when attempting to escape. We had seven or eight men wounded, the most of them slightly, among them was Lieut. Glub. No one was killed. The Kerowlee Rajah's troops had before this destroyed a portion of the same set, when attempting to cross the Chumbuli. The column next proceeded towards Muttra, at which place they arrived on the 31st, having cut up some 150 rebels at the village of Bhegree, where a large quantity of ammunition was secured. They were still at Muttra on the 2nd November, and were next to march towards Hodul.

NYNEE TAL.

This beautiful mountain retreat, basking in the bosom of the Himalayas, could not, in spite of its seclusion, in these times of tribulation, escape attack. About the middle of October, a rebel force of about 5,000 strong, including 1000 cavalry, took up positions at Haldwanee and Kalladeedpore, thus blockading the only two passes that lead to Nynee Tal, and an inviting affair of attacking that place, which is nearly inaccessible with a handful of determined men to defend it. They fired a salute in honor of the occasion. The native mountaineers of the neighborhood, the moment they were made aware of what had occurred in sheer good will, and without pay or other inducement, poured down to protect the passes of which every peak, precipice, and cavern was known to them. Major Ramsay, commanding the 8th Irregulars, proceeding with a party of 300 to examine their position. On his way he came across 300 troops, formerly belonging to his corps, but who fled the moment he approached them. On nearing the enemy, he endeavored to draw out their cavalry, with the view of decoying them across the Gola canal, and then cutting off their retreat. Unfortunately for us they saw their danger before they were deep enough in our toils, and galloped back full speed, before we were able to occupy the bridge in their rear. With the jungle fever on all sides of them, impenetrable passes in their rear, they quickly got tired of the game of blockading, and decamped, and the beautiful sanatarium is once more safe as a retreat, void of all alarm.

CAWNPORE.

Our last dates from Cawnpore extended to the 24th October, and gave particulars of an excursion to Bithoor on the 18th, with the approach of reinforcements from north to south. Since then the direct mails have been plundered, and we have, for the fortnight, been deprived of the communications of our own correspondents, and have been compelled to draw on intelligence reaching us by the circuit of Calcutta. On the morning of the 22nd a convoy of 700 men, with four guns, left in charge of provisions for Allumbagh, where the sufferings of the garrison were very severe. Though within three miles of Lucknow, they knew nothing whatever of what had occurred there within the previous fortnight. On the morning of the 26th Brigadier Grant's column marched into Cawnpore a day earlier than was expected. It consists of two companies of Sappers and Miners, three troops of Horse Artillery, and two 18-pounder guns, 600 of her Majesty's 9th Lancers, her Majesty's 8th and 75th Foot, two regiments of Sikh cavalry, and the like number of infantry. They were in high health and spirits, had been in every action, nearly thirty in number, since the commencement of the siege of Delhi, and swept all before them on the way down. On the following day the 23rd Highlanders and 200 of the Naval Brigade had joined them. The most tremendous reports are prevalent in reference to the last two throughout the country. The sailors are said to be fourteen feet high, four feet across the shoulders, and to carry a field piece under each arm, with as much ease as a porter would carry a bundle. The men in petticoats are believed to have been especially sent out by her Majesty so attired, to be avenged for the slaughter of our women and children. The strength of the garrison at this time was about 1,500; Grant's force about 3,500, and the reinforcements joined before the 30th would bring the grand total up to about 7,000. On the 31st of October Brigadier Grant's column, now 5,000 strong, crossed the Ganges, and arrived at Allumbagh, without opposition, on the 3rd of November. They took with them 2500 camels and 50 carts, with supplies for Lucknow. On the same day Sir Colin Campbell arrived at Cawnpore. He had been very nearly made prisoner on his way up. He and his staff appear to have been proceeding very injudiciously, without an escort, when they suddenly came up with a body of the mutineers of the 32nd Native Infantry. They were mounted on elephants, and were accompanied by seventy-five native troopers. The Commander-in-Chief, as soon as he observed the enemy, retreated, till he found refuge in a bullock train, some ten miles in the rear. The troops continued for a while to hover round, and the marvel was that this piece of unparalleled rashness should not have terminated fatally. Having arrived at Cawnpore on the 3rd, Sir Colin Campbell remained there till the 9th, when he started for Alumbagh, where Grant's column was understood to be awaiting his arrival. The cause of the delay is not explained, but betwixt the 3rd and the 9th of November nothing decisive could have occurred, or we should have heard of it by telegraph from Madras, the channel through which our latest tidings generally reach us, being conveyed thither by steamer from Calcutta. On the afternoon of the 1st inst., a sharp action occurred near the village of Kudjnai, betwixt the Dinapore mutineers and a detachment of 800 men, consisting of part of the Naval Brigade and a detachment of the 93rd Highlanders, two 9-pounder guns, under Col. Powell of her Majesty's 53rd Foot. Our loss was heavy, Col. Powell being amongst the slain.

CENTRAL INDIA.

The course of the Bombay force in Central India, long known as the Mhow column, under Colonel Stewart, who succeeded Brigadier Woodburn, has been and is to the northward since the occupation of the fort of Dhar, mentioned in my last. The point which it desired to attain was Mundesore, where, as you know, there has been for some time collected an armed rabble, against which the Neemuch force made that unfortunate move of which I wrote a fortnight ago. But, in marching north, Colonel Stewart found work to do at Mehidpore. There, on the 8th, the infantry and artillery of the contingent [the cavalry mutined long ago, killing their officers] were attacked by some 4,000 mercenaries and scoundrels of all kinds. After a gallant fight the guns were captured, when, we are told, the Mussulmans among the contingents joined the insurgents. Captain Mills, Dr. Carey, and two serjeant majors, were killed. Major Timming escaped to the Malwa the force, (Col. Stewart's), and a serjeant major, made a few faithful men of the contingent, to Indore, where Holkar received them with all kindness. Brigadier Stewart's fall in with the victorious rebels on the 13th, and indicted severe loss on them. The cavalry of the Mysorean Contingents under Major Orr, performed this service. The party of the rebels attacked were a strong rearguard. The cavalry detachments of the 1st, 3rd and 4th regiments, Hyderabad Contingent, charged on both flanks and doubled them up, capturing all the guns and stores taken from the contingent at Mehidpore, together with two of their own guns. One officer, lieutenant Samuel, was dangerously wounded in this excellent piece of service. The column of Brigadier Stewart is to be reinforced by the 38th, which corps is being sent round to us from Calcutta, and may be daily expected. It will also receive two more companies of the 80th from Belgaum where they are relieved by the rest of the 2nd Europeans from Kurrachee. The force in Guzerat and Rajpootana is to be at once strengthened by a wing of the 95th from Bombay, with a battery of artillery and a company of Royal Engineers, who arrived from England by last mail. Thus in three several directions is the Western Presidency penetrating, or preparing to penetrate, Central India. I have no fear but that full justice will be done at home to the foresight and energy of the government of Bombay, when the time comes for taking a general view of the insurrection.

GREATHED'S COLUMN.

But to return to Greathed's (now become Grant's) column. On the 14th it crossed the Jumna and marched for Mynpoorie. The petty chief of that place made his submission to the brigadier and was graciously received but his little fort was blown up, and his three or four guns destroyed. Thence the column proceeded towards Ferruckabad. In my last, you remember, I anticipated that the punishment of the Nawab of Futtyghur in that neighbourhood would be a primary object of the force; and so it was, but the calls from Lucknow for aid were still more pressing, so Futtyghur stands over for a time, and the column went on down the Ganges for Cawnpore. Near Kauorije it fell in with some 300 Delhi fugitives, making for Oude, and destroyed two-thirds of them capturing their five guns. This was on the 23rd. Five days later, on the 28th the brigadier entered Cawnpore, and on the 30th, as I have written, crossed into Oude for Lucknow. Meanwhile, the other Delhi column, under Brigadier Showers, has been circling about in the districts to the south and west of the capital with the most re-assuring and settling effect. When I last wrote this little force—composed of portions of the Carabineers, Hodson's and the Guide Cavalry, a field battery, two or three heavy guns and mortars, the 2nd Bengal Fusiliers, Ghoorkas, and Poojab Rifles—after pacifying the Rewaree district, was moving upon Jeghar. The Nawab of that ilk was captured at his hunting-box [shikargah], and was sent into Delhi to stand his trial, which, as he has [so writes an officer from Agra] "been against us from first to last," can, we may hope, only end one way. Thus the town and fort of Jughur was occupied with its stores and ammunition, and a further movement upon the strong fort of Kanoud was equally successful. There the brigadier halted for a while, preparatory to a sweep back towards Delhi in another direction. His last service is the arrest of the Nawab of Furruckhugur. Nor is Agra idle in the work of pacification. Of its small garrison of the 3rd European and one battery, one detachment holds Muttra and another Alighur, with its excellent little fort. The restoration of tranquility is accelerated by the attitude of the Rajah of Bhurtpore, who had the prudence to repulse a party of the Delhi fugitives and whose capital is again a safe residence for British officers. Indeed, of the whole country between Delhi and Agra I may say, upon the authority of a most intelligent officer of long experience in the upper provinces, that "the subsidence of the revolt has been even more rapid than its rise;" that the crops are every where excellent, and that, almost incredible as it may appear, this year's revenue is likely to be almost entirely saved to the state. The peasants during all the commotions, have for the most part, gone about their ordinary labour, and when the time comes for making their accustomed payments they will make them as of old. This is a very noteworthy feature of the insurrection.

THE CALCUTTA MAIL.

From the Time's Correspondent.

The preparations for the relief of the garrison of Lucknow are rapidly advancing. Colonel Hope Grant, with Colonel Greathed's column, 3,500 strong, reached Cawnpore on the 28th October. He crossed the Ganges on the 30th with eighteen guns, and his arrival at Alumbagh has been already reported. He met with no opposition on the road, which, indeed, during the late operations has always been clear, the enemy concentrating all their forces around Lucknow. The column will remain in the Alumbagh till the arrival of the Commander-in-Chief, who left Calcutta on the 28th of October. Sir Colin Campbell travels like a courier, and on the 3rd of November he was at Cawnpore.

Colonel Berkeley's column is on the road. Colonel Rimde, whose force is in Rewah, is said to have received his orders; so has Colonel Lowndes, who, with 520 Europeans, had marched to quiet Juanpore. Col. Wroughton, with most of Jung Bahadoor's Ghoorkas, is already on the frontiers of Oude. Some Sikhs are on their march from Delhi, and altogether Sir Colin Campbell ought to have at least 5,000 Europeans, and some 3000 Sikhs and Ghoorkas at his disposal. He will not have so many for the actual relief of Lucknow, and has received a letter from Sir James Outram, declaring that the garrison can hold out for some days yet, and begging that no thought of its danger may interfere with a complete victory. It is understood that Sir Colin will, when all is ready, cross the Goomtee, advance on the back opposite the town, and from that vantage ground shell the enemy out. He will then occupy and perhaps enter the Residency amongst the loss of a man. Lucknow, once occupied, and fortified, will become the base of operations, inch by inch, to may re-conquer Oude.

It is generally understood that Nena Sahib, self-appointed Peishwa, has assumed the command-in-chief at Onde, and some profess to see traces of ability and plan in the more recent movements of the rebels. That some idea of concentration prevails among them is obvious from the manner in which the detached bodies have quitted Bengal. It is certain, too, that they fight harder than they did. Government has published a telegraph announcing a victory at a place called Burdee, near Allahabad. Captain Peel makes the best of his story, but it seems clear that the enemy fought with desperation, that our loss was severe, and that it was considered prudent to retain so advanced a position. At Futtehsarai again, near Agra, the rebels were dislodged by a party from the garrison on the 29th of October. Most of them fled, but a party seized a building on the heights and died like men with the halter round their necks. Lieutenant Glubb and 17 privates were killed.

Several other engagements have been reported during the week. The greatest occurred in Jounpore. Col. Wroughton, who was moving towards the eastern frontier of Oude with some 1,500 Ghoorkas and two guns, was met by some 5,000 of the enemy with seven guns. The mutineers deployed with beautiful accuracy, displayed at least a solid line nearly two miles long. They did not, however, charge, but opened a heavy fire upon the Ghoorkas. The little men—they are not above five feet—disapproved the proceeding, and with their usual pluck flung themselves forward on enemies three times their number. The curved knives make quick work. Ten minutes after their charge the enemy had disappeared, leaving four guns, and 700 bodies on the field. These Goorkas are the men for whom Sir Charles Napier had so strong, and, as it has proved, so well grounded an admiration. Both they and the Sikhs despise the Sepoys, and close in with them at once, without an attempt at tactics. One thing is quite clear. We can never use Sepoys against native levies again. Their prestige has disappeared for ever, and a Sikh, an Arab, an Afghan, or a Ghoorka, will now charge a Sepoy regiment as readily as an Englishman would do. They have thrashed them at odds of three to one, while fighting with our discipline, or our tactics, and in our uniform.

On the 15th or 16th of October again some cavalry dispatched by Brigadier Showers, attacked the remnant of the Jhujjur force, near Kanoud. The enemy lost 400 men, and were again completely dispersed. Another body was then dispatched to Kanoud, which, on the 19th of October, occupied the fortress, seizing 18 guns, military stores, and lakhs of treasure. The mutineers, under Koor Singh, the Bengalee Zemindar, who were in possession of Bandee, are also reported to have been cut up by the Zemindars. He himself has departed, it is said, for Gwalior, where he will probably be hung by Scindiah as soon as the scale turns a little in our favour. His forces are said to have been annihilated, but that statement rests on native authority, and may or may not be correct.

About Jubbulpore all is said to be in a state of anarchy. There are two regiments of Madras Cavalry there, but the rebels are in every direction, like flies in summer, and the force cannot leave the station.

The troops are arriving fast. The Alma spoke thirty-six ships near the mouth of the river, and we have already had the Sydney with 320 men of the Royal Artillery; Ulysses and Surrey, with 652 men of her Majesty's 42nd Regiment; Lady Jocelyn, with 765 of her Majesty's 54th Rifle Brigade, and Royal Artillery; Canda, with 602 of her fewer the garrison not nearly so badly off as we are reduced; we have been using their provisions ever since we arrived. The enemy had mined all around them, and had we not come, would have blown them up, though they had provisions to hold out. I hope we shall be soon in our turn relieved; the enemy have regularly blockaded us, and it would be madness to attempt to carry off 600 or 700 wounded, and 500 ladies and children with our present small force. Our loss has been very heavy; we have lost in killed and wounded 66 officers and nearly 1,000 men. All the influential people about here are against us." We are all put on rations, and if supplies do not come in soon, we shall have to turn out all our horses.

NARROW ESCAPE OF SIR COLIN CAMPBELL.

BENARES, Oct. 31.—The Commander in Chief has come and gone. He arrived to-day at 8 a. m., and put up at Col. Gordon's, where he breakfasted and saw some officers, whence he had paid a visit to Lieut. Governor. He started for Allahabad at one p. m. On this side of Shergotty the Commander in Chief's party came across, most unexpectedly, a detachment of the fugitive and mutinous 32nd, and were very nearly caught by them. Had the garries been five hundred yards further on the road, the whole party would have been cut off to a man, for they were proceeding without an escort of any kind. The gallant Sepoys were seen travelling like gentlemen on elephants, of which fourteen were counted, an Lancer also escorted by 25 Sowars, who hovered some time about the carriages.—As soon as this cavalcade was perceived, the carriages turned back, and retraced their steps for ten miles till they came up with a bullock train party. This accounts for the delay in the Commander in Chief's arrival, who otherwise would have been here yesterday. You may imagine how excited people became here, when coupled with the non-arrival of Sir Colin, it became known in the afternoon that the electic communication was interrupted between this and Shergotty; but little did the good folks think how near their suspicions were to realization, for it is not to be denied that, to use a common phrase, the Comander in Chief was as nearly "nabbed" as possible, and all his staff with him. Now, why were elephants allowed to be retained for the use of these miserable traitors and murderers, called Sepoys, when brave British soldiers sadly wanted them to carry their baggage and tents to the north west? Sir Colin looked uncommonly fresh and well, and intended to be at Cawnpore the day after to-morrow.

THE MASSACRE AT CAWNPORE.

The following is an extract from the letter of an officer of the Madras Fusiliers:

"Cawnpore, Oct. 28.—I went the other day to see the house of horrors where the unfortunate women and children were massacred. At the entrance I found a gibbet, and under it the carcass of a wretch who had just been hanged as a spy.

"It is a small brick building, built in a square, the rooms opening into a small court yard in the centre. The place is still strewn with fragments of clothes and lots of shoes. The walls in places are sprinkled with blood and the mats on the floor appear to have been drenched with it. On carefully examining the walls I found scratched on the plaster behind a door the following—written apparently by the wife of a European soldier, of whom there were several shut up there:—

"'Countrymen and women, remember the 15th of July, '57. Your wives and families are here in misery and at the disposal of savages, who has ravished both young and old, and then killed us. Oh! oh! my child! my child! Countrymen revenge it!'

"I don't think anything would appeal so strongly to the feelings of our countrymen at home as this simple statement of misery. It is expressed and spelt as above, and seemed to have been scratched with the point of a knife. The walls of the little room where it was written were spattered with blood, and the plaster cut in several places with swords.

"I went to see the intrenchment where Wheeler defended himself so long. It is a low mud bank about three feet high, surrounding two large buildings that were formerly hospitals. The walls of these are literally riddled by round shot, and the roofs of both have fallen in. It seems quite miraculous, when you look at the wretched defence, how men could have held out one day, much less many days, against a host well armed, and provided with big guns and every requisite material. They must have been arrant cowards—as, indeed, we know they were—for they never dared to come out into the open, but fired from under cover of some half-finished barracks near the intrenchment. If with the force we have had hitherto, we have been able to command victory, what will it be when England's armies now arriving march through the country? In six months India will be more entirely in our power than it ever has been before."

On the Improvement of the Breed of Horses.

From the New York Tribune.

It is an indisputable fact that all the excellence of the English and American thorough-bred horse is derived from Oriental blood of the desert, and originates, it is believed, in the admixture of the various breeds of the several countries to which the horse, in its purest and highest form, has from remote ages been indigenous. These countries are Arabia, Syria, Persia, Turkistan, the Barbary States, Nubia, and Abyssinia, all of which have races nearly connected with each other, but all possessing distinct characteristics. There would appear of these races to be the English thorough-bred horse—with which the American is identical—a larger proportion of the Barb than of pure Arabian blood. The celebrated Godolphin is generally considered by the most competent judges to have been a Barb. Fairfax's celebrated horse was a Barb; the Royal mares imported by King Charles II., of which nine-tenths of our thorough-bred horses trace, were Tunisian or Tangier Barbs. The other most famous progenitors have been Turks, as the Byerly Turk, the Lyster or straddling Turk, the D'Arcy yellow Turk, Place's white Turk, and many others. The most noted of the pure Arabians was the Darley Arabian.—And it is the most considerable opinion that the great and unrivalled excellence of the English horse arises from the fact that he is the offspring of a judicious cross of all the best Oriental races, and not the produce of a system of close in-breeding.

It is worthy of remark, however, that although the fact is universally admitted that the whole original excellence of the English thorough blood is attributable to the blood of the desert, and although no horse is to be held as thorough-bred unless he can trace in both lines, parental and maternal, to that blood, and although many horses of various Eastern and African breeds have been constantly imported both into England and America during the last two hundred years, no one of them has improved the breed of race horses within the last century, or perhaps two centuries. So low at present does modern Arabian blood stand in the estimation of English Turfmen, that a horse begotten by a Turkish, Arab, Barb or Persian stallion, on an English thorough-bred mare, receives, in the Goodwood Cup and other races in which allowances are given, 24 lbs. from all English-bred racers; and a horse begotten by such a stallion on a mare of any one of the same races, receives the enormous advantage of 48 lbs. The facts that even with this enormous advantage no horse so bred ever wins any plate or race of consideration, shows that the distaste to the blood is not a prejudice, but is founded on valid reasons. Why this should be so is not so clear. It appears, however, to be a certain and fixed rule of breeding, that in order to improve any race, the higher and purer blood must be on the sire's side, not on the dam's; and he must be the superior animal. It is, we think, now an indisputable and undeniable fact that the English thorough-bred horse is in all respects, but especially in size, bone, power and beauty, a superior animal to any of the Oriental races, and consequently that his blood cannot be improved by any further admixture of that strain. Why this should be so cannot clearly be shown; but it arises probably from two causes; first, that as the Mohammedan race has degenerated in intellectual energy, in civilization and in power, the breed of horses used by that race has suffered a corresponding deterioration, owing to the want of intelligent breeding, of care, of management, and to the inferiority of their food, stabling and nurture; and, second, that the English and American descendants of the same horses have, by the vast attention given to the breeding them only from the best and choice parents, to their more general nutriment, better housing and clothing, and the enlightened and scientific culture which they have long received, been improved in proportion to the deterioration of their ancestors.

No intelligent sportsman doubts that the English and American thorough-bren horse can beat the Oriental horse anywhere and everywhere, and in all respects. In Hindostan, at the European races, the wholebred and half-bred English horses invariably beat the Indian Arabs; and very recently an English mare, named Fair Nell, disgracefully beat all the Egyptian Barbs of Ali Pasha, who had challenged the English Jockey Club to a trial match between English and Oriental horses for a prize of £10,000. The Jockey Club declined to take up the match collectively, because as a body they do not own race horses and individually because the risk of running the best horses in a race of 8 miles, which was proposed, over the rough and stony or sandy desert, was held rightly to be too great to justify the sending of animals of great value to a distant and barbarous country. The English residents at Alexandria and Cairo, however, excited by national spirit, and provoked by the triumphant tone of the Orientals, resolved to test the question. The Irish mare "Fair Nell" was selected, which was not a racer of any note or distinction, and about which there is now some dispute whether she is or is not actually thorough-bred, though she is known to be very highly and very well bred; and the result was that, vastly to the disgust and disappointment of the Egyptians, she defeated all the best Arabs of the Pasha's stud with perfect ease. It has been asserted, and is constantly urged by the favorers and defenders of Oriental blood, that no horse of really superior qualities or decided excellence, as Arabs or Barbs, have recently been imported; and that to this, and to no natural or general inferiority of the Arab or Oriental horse, is the want of success in breeding from him to be attributed, and, as a matter of course, every one who imports an Arab or Barb, asserts that his horse, and his only, is a real and superior blooded animal.

The plea is not, however, a valid one, for it is not likely, when a great majority of the horses imported from the East both into England and America have been gifts of Oriental potentates to crowned heads or presidents, that no one of them should have been a valuable creature. Still less is it likely that obscure and comparatively unknown modern travellers have succeeded in securing better blood than the lavish expenditure and scientific knowledge of the richest of European individuals and the most enlightened and powerful of European governments. It is clearly the sounder opinion that the modern thorough-bred horse of Oriental origin is a superior creature to the modern Arab; and consequently is is clearly unwise to attempt to breed thorough-bred mares to Oriental stallions, or to breed any highly bred mares to such stallions in preference to the best thoroughbreds. Still it appears not improbable that the general trotting stock of America might be improved by crossing with good Arabian and Barb blood, where the best thorough blood, combined with fine form and power is not to be attained. We are even impressed with the idea that with some half-blooded breeds, such as the Canadians and Normans, both of which have a large, although a very remote cross of the African Barbs of Andalusian breed, a recurrence to the original, undiluted Barb or Arabian blood might be preferable even to breeding from modern thorough-breds on the principle before referred to, of having, after many years or centuries of out-crossing, recourse to the original strain of blood, which is often found to nick, as it is technically termed, when it succeeded highly. It is worthy of remark that some distinguished trotting horses trace to Black Bashaw, who was a pure Barb of Tripoli, and who is said to be a horse of great beauty and power. The Canadians and Normans both show far more similitude of structure and form to the Arabs and Barbs than do the modern thorough-bred horses; and that is a stronger reason for believing that such a cross might prove successful. Half-bred horses between the Indian, Arab and English half-bred mares, have been found to answer admirably for cavalry horses, are used for that purpose exclusively in the Anglo-Indian service. The 10th Hussars, mounted on animals of this stamp, attracted great attention in the Crimea, where these horses were found to be hardier and enduring of privation and exposure to weather than the English horses of two or three thorough crosses, although inferior to them in speed, in length of stride, and in weight in the shock of battle. The same remark applies to the half-bred Algerine Barbs, ridden by the French Chasseur d' Afriques and Chasseurs Indigines, most of which, it is said, are bred from mares of Normandy or Picardy; and this would encourage the hope of success in breeding from Normans and Canadians to horses of Oriental blood. We should like to hear of the experiment being tried, and although we should not care to predict perfect success, we should rather anticipate a good than an evil result; we would, however, on no account put a thorough-bred mare to an Eastern horse, nor any very highly bred mare, where a thorough-bred stallion is within reach. Of course, the boniest, most compact and strongest Arabs should be selected; an Arab weed of an inferior strain is a very poor creature for any purpose, and worst of all from which to breed. From what we have heard of the Nolan Arab, and from the consummate knowledge in horse-flesh of his gallant owner we should argue as well of him as of any recent importation from the East. We should not be surprised if, in future days, material improvement in the horse-flesh of the West, where there has been, until very recently, a great want of thorough blood, may be traced to that horse.

A New Necromancer.

On Wednesday night Professor Wiljalba Frikell having taken the St. James's Theatre, gave, for the first time, his new entertainment, of which "Two Hours of Illusions" is the appropriate title. When the curtain rises there is nothing on the stage but one or two ordinary chairs. The Professor comes forward with a piece of black cloth in his hand, about as big as a pocket handkerchief. He shows you both sides of it, waves it about, rolls it up, compresses it into a ball, and then unfolding it, takes from it, and deposits on the chairs, a succession of glass bowls, each full of water and containing a gold fish. It is impossible to conceive where they come from; after which the professor goes through the same process of waiving, unfolding, and crumpling up the piece of black cloth; he himself is dressed in a tight-fitting black suit, and is in almost perpetual motion, so that it is not easy to suppose that he has half a dozen bowls full of water, to say nothing of the fish, up his sleeve, or beneath any part of his costume. He borrows a watch from one of the spectators, and holding it to the ear of another, compels him to admit that it is stopped, a third that it is going; to others he makes it indicate a different time in each case; then in apparent indignation at so bad a time-keeper, he violently stamps on it, and taking it up, shuts his hands, and immediately opens it, and you see that the watch has disappeared. He brings forward two flower-pots with plants in them; a lady in front of him chooses one of them, and he throws the other on the stage, takes the plant out of it, and shows the watch at the bottom of the earth, in which it was imbedded.

He receives a hat from some confiding spectator, shows you the inside of it, taps the sides and crown with a short wand, and immediately draws out of it a silver cup, then another and another to the number of fifty, placing them in a row on a long board. He brings eggs out in the same way, showers of perfumed packets, and other nick-nacks. He tears the hat to pieces, folds it up into a tight parcel, and places it on a chair; in another moment it descends from the top of the theatre to the head of its owner. Three little black flags, which are inspected by the company at pleasure, on being twirled about for a moment, multiply themselves in his hands into scores and hundreds of other flags, which fall in hundreds among the spectators. We not only cannot enumerate a tenth part of the tricks performed by the Professor, but we are obliged to confine ourselves to one or two of the simplest, and to some tastes, perhaps, the least attractive, many of them being both so rapid and so intricate as to be exceedingly difficult to follow. The general superiority of Professor Frikell over all conjurers we have ever been astonished by, lies in the absence of all apparatus, and the apparent simplicity of the means by which his marvellous illusions are brought about. Not the least pleasant part of the entertainment is the Professor's infinite vivacity. His face, hands, feet, and body are in incessant but graceful motion, and he keeps up a running comment on his performances in a wonderful and amusing language, compounded out of German, French, and broken English. After two hours passed in admiring and wondering at this clever magicians infinite dexterity and inexhaustable resources, it is not easy to reconcile oneself to the common-place world of cause and effect, and humiliating to find that one can do nothing with one's own hat but put it on and go home in it.—Bell's Life, Dec. 7.

The Slave Trade.

Dr. Livingstone, the African traveller, has addressed the following letter to the London Times:—

SIR,—Having in former years imbibed the idea, from speeches made in Parliament and from articles in newspapers similar to that in your leader of the 24th, that our squadron on the West coast of Africa, so far from diminishing, rather increased the evils of the slave trade, I went to Angola in 1854 fully expecting to find, as you remark, that this "nefarious traffic still subsists as much as ever," When, however, I came in contact with Portuguese who had actually been engaged in the trade, and heard them refer to it invariably in the past tense, my confidence was somewhat shaken in the soundness of Parliamentary information. "Such a man was rich," said they, "in time of the slave trade."

And when I saw boys of 10 or 12 years of age sold for about 12s each within 150 miles of the coast, and heard the emphatic exclamation "Ah! we could have got 60 or 70 dollars for these lads in the time of slave trade," with the frank confession by those who, of all others, ought to know best that the prime agents in the repression of the traffic were the English cruisers, I was forced to a different conclusion from that to which the really very plausible statements of various parties had led me.

Then, again, I saw crowds of carriers (carregadores) on the road from the interior to the coast. These carriers are compelled by the Government of Loanda to convey merchandize at the rate of 2d a day. On examining this system of compulsory labor, I found it to be a direct evidence of the efficiency of our cruisers in repressing the slave trade. Thus previous to 1845, when the squadron was increased to the strength it had before the breaking out of the Russian war, all the merchandize of Angola was brought down to the coast by slaves. The merchants went inland with a few slaves bearing goods, and purchased ivory and beeswax with slaves sufficient to carry them. All were intended for exportation, and there was no more difficulty in shipping the human cargo than the loads they carried

But on the augmentation of the force on the coast the Government resorted to this species of impressment to supply the place of the slaves which were previously all exported. The spectacle of a large gang of slaves marched down to the coast, so common previous to 1845, is now never seen; and if we glance at the Custom house returns we find that the receipts for head money gradually diminished from that year till 1850, when none was received. This sacrifice of a large revenue by the Portuguese Government shows that we are not the only people who have made efforts to put down the odious traffic; and if half the honesty of purpose which you civilly ascribe to the Governor of Cuba had characterised the officials sent to Angola the trade would have entirely ceased.

A few incorrigible slave-dealers, wished at by the governors of Loanda, who in words would outmatch General Concha in strenuous endeavours to annihilate the traffic, have continued to export a few loads annually from certain parts worth of Loanda. But this has been a difficult game to play, inasmuch as their own countrymen willingly give information to the cruisers for a small consideration, and being obliged to conceal their shipment from both parties, they stand, as it were, between two fires.

So far from brisk is the export trade that I once travelled in company with three native slaveholders who led eight women in a chain away from the coast toward the middle of the country to sell them for ivory. One of their owners said "that the English cruizers alone prevented their being sold across the sea." And as for the alleged increase of cruelty in the middle passage, any one who reads how slaves were treated when the slave trade was legal, will see that it was often even then as bad as it could be. It is of such a heathenish, or rather fiendish nature, that men engaged in it are somehow led to treat their fellow men immeasurably worse than they would animals of equal or inferior value.

Notwithstanding the very decided influence of the cruisers on the parts I visited, there seems to have been an increase in traffic since the strength of the cruisers were reduced by the Russian war; and this increase has taken place in the rivers North of Angola. The prostitution of the American flag is a serious drawback to our efforts at suppression. Yet it must be borne in mind that we hear more about it nowadays; and the increase of our knowledge of an abuse does not imply an actual augmentation of the evil.

While our attention is directed to greater numbers of slaves being imported into Cuba, we must not shut our eyes to the fact of another market being closed altogether to the trade, nor forget that the present posture of Brazil is owing to the moral influence of Great Britain. Cuba would, were the trade open, take and kill off 50,000 slaves annually. About two-thirds are kept away from her shores by the present blockade. That with another large market closed to the traffic, is surely not an ignoble failure.

I have thus ventured to state my conviction in favour of our present system formed, as it was, from personal observation, that you may, according to your custom, and if you should deem it advisable, give this to your readers by way of helping them to both sides of the question. It is not to be supposed for a moment that the present system of coercion will result in a radical cure of the evil. The cultivation by the Africans on their own soil of the raw materials of our manufacture, and the influence of Christian civilization alone will effect a permanent suppression of the slave trade. But all hopes of this must be given up if the coast tribes are to be hounded on by Europeans to hunt down the defenceless inland inhabitants on the absurd pretence of prompting "free emigration."

It is no more true that the Africans take delight in hunting, buying and selling each other than that the English glory in hanging themselves in November. I know that this is the case throughout the interior, and was sorry at the cause of a different state of things on the boarders of civilization. But we are ignorant of the sources whence statements such as that referred to arise. From meeting it in various quarters, and more especially in the months of slaveholders, or would-be slave employers, I am inclined to think that both it and that about the inefficiency of her Majesty's cruisers have had their origin with those who are, directly or indirectly, abettors of slavery, and that they are promulgated by many who, like myself, had not the means of testing their truth.

I am, &c.,
DAVID LIVINGSTONE.

The Marriage of the Princess Royal.

The Times' Berlin correspondent, writing on the 10th, says:—Prince Frederick William, on his return from his visit to the King and Queen at Charlottenburg on Tuesday last, proceeded, in company of his architect, professor Strack, to inspect the progress of the palace that is being converted to his use; and yesterday afternoon he devoted several hours to a similar inspection of the suite of apartments that he and the Princess Royal are to occupy provisionally in the Royal Schloss, on their arrival here next February. The external work of the future palace is already so far completed that the scaffolding is taken down on all sides, with the exception of that portion of the front where a new portion is to be added, and it is very satisfactory to observe, not only how extremely well the "Palace of the old King" looks after its metamorphosis, but also how warm is the interest taken by all classes in its completion. As ladies-in-waiting on the Princess Royal when she enters on her new dignities here have been appointed the Countess Perponcher (Mistress of the Robes), the Countess of Lynar, and the Countess Hohenthal; in compliance with the Court usage, the Princess will not be attended by any lady of her own Court or nation.

One of the most important fetes in connection with the marriage of the Princess Royal and the Prince Frederick William will be a grand reception, for the purpose of a formal presentation of the elite of the beau monde to the Prince and Princess after their nuptials. This reception will, we believe, be held at Buckingham Palace.

A great many royal and distinguished personages are expected to arrive in January, on a visit to her Majesty, in order to be present at the marriage of the Princess Royal and Prince Frederick William. The King of the Belgians, the Prince and Princess of Prussia, and the Duke of Saxe Coburg will be inmates of Buckingham palace, and for other visitors of less exalted rank a suite of rooms has been engaged at Farrance's hotel, in Belgravia, where they will be attended by the Queen's own servants and have the use of her Majesty's carriages.

The marriage of the Princess Royal is to be celebrated at the Chapel Royal, St. James's on the 25th of January, and we understand that in honour of the occasion the Queen has commanded three performances to take place at her Majesty's theatre.—They are to consist of a tragedy, a comedy, and an opera. The tragedy is to be performed on the 10th. Macbeth has been selected, and the production of it is confided to Mr. Phelps. It is expected that the cast will comprise all the dramatic strength which can be brought to bear on the occasion, and we hear rumours that Miss Helen Faucit is likely to represent Lady Macbeth. The opera is to be Balfe's Rose of Castille, which is now being represented at the Lyceum. We believe that the comedy has not been finally chosen, but conclude that it will be one of Shakespeare's or Sheridan's. As the metropolis will be full of foreigners, and special representatives of every court will be here, we have no doubt that the various managers to whom these performances are entrusted will make every exertion to carry them out with eclat.

We understand that her Majesty has selected Lady Churchill and Viscount Sydney to be the lady and lord in attendance upon her Royal Highness the Princess Royal in the journey, after her highness's marriage, from London to Berlin.

The Result of the Elections.

So far as Upper Canada, the Elections are now complete; while in Lower Canada there are but few remaining to be held. Taken as a whole, which indeed is the only legitimate political view of them, they have returned a large majority favourable to Mr. Macdonald's government. Some opposition journals, taking their text from the Toronto Globe, would argue, because Mr. Macdonald's policy is not sustained by a sectional majority in Upper Canada, that notwithstanding the immense preponderance of the Lower Canada majority over the Upper Canada minority, the balance because it does not hang the same in both sections, is therefore against the government. This is a very pernicious doctrine, and, if carried out, must lead either to a dissolution of the Union, or continual dissolutions of the House. The Union of the Provinces was done with the view of producing an amalgamation of political elements, and not merely a bond of confederation; so that, to talk of distinct divisions in the House of Assembly is to ignore the fact of its being one indivisible body; and to expose the country to the continual risk of a relapse into its divisional boundaries. It is the misfortune of all parties that they are liable to be encumbered with impracticable, unscrupulous or overzealous abettors, who, wanting reason and discernment, pursue their object with a blind passion, weakening the positions they profess to support, by suggesting new and untenable theories; and thus withdrawing the public attention from true to false issues, they give to the opposite party the means of escape. Such is the case now, and the chief disturber of the harmony in the opposition is the Toronto Globe; first, he professes to be all in all with those who seek that the representation of the people, in those branches of the Legislature which are open to them, shall be in proportion to the number of the population of the country, and that the representative divisions shall be as nearly equal as possible, and all this to be done in careful forgetfulness of the dividing line which once existed between Upper and Lower Canada, and which was obliterated by the Union. While this question is still the order of the day, its pretended advocate, Mr. George Brown must needs complicate it by insisting that the dividing line shall be still preserved, so as that the majorities of the House may be ascertained by sections, thus introducing a political contradiction which is calculated to defeat the object of the party which he also professes to have at heart. How is it possible for sectional or double majorities to be insisted on, at the same time with an unsectional House and representation according to population? The thing is impossible, and Mr. Brown knows it, and for that reason insists on it, because he hopes thus to open the way to power, by the mystification in which he would drown the great question of the day. It is to be hoped the true and rational opposition will hold to those points which are debatable, and not confound itself by following a false lead.

The Financial Affairs of the Town.

The people who pay taxes into the Town treasury are warned that all is not right with them. The sooner they wake up to the danger of their position, the better for themselves; for without assuming the air of an alarmist, it is quite within the bounds of moderation to declare that the financial management of the Town is conducted upon the grossest principles of mismanagement and deceit. Why is there no money in the treasury, and where are all the Municipal Loan Fund Debentures gone to? Are the £20,000 sterling not apportioned something after the following fashion, viz:—

The Contractor,	£6,500
Paid on the Iron,	2,500
Deposited as security for further payment on the Iron,	9,000
Bonus supposed to have been paid to the Municipality who let us into their shoes.,	1,500
Deposited with the Commercial Bank here as collateral security on a protested note,	500
	£20,000

And if this is the case, why do the Records of the Municipality deny the fact? Has the Town Treasurer, Mr. Clurton, paid away securities without the authority of the Mayor, or has the Mayor authorised the conveyance without the sanction of the Council? Let them answer. It is right the taxpayers should know what is being done with their money, what is being charged on their property; and they want to know, when there is expenditure, what it is they are getting in return for it. If the Mayor and the Treasurer, or either of them, cannot account to the satisfaction of those in whose trust they act, it is to be hoped at any rate that the new Council will not stultify itself by reappointing Mr. Stevenson to the Mayoralty, or by continuing Mr. Clurton in the Treasurership. It is for these officers to clear up the impression that is publicly felt concerning them, and the clearest and most straightforward way is to publish a statement of their acts in relation to these debentures, stating particularly what they have acquired in behalf of the Town, in the nature of scrip or railway securities, and what portion of the Loan they have spent, and to whom, and for what paid. The Town ought to have a general financial statement of its affairs, but the most pressing item, because the most alarming, is that which concerns her railway enterprise, and this they ought to feel the greatest interest in affording for their own sakes, since the dissatisfaction is so widespread, and apparently so well grounded. It is to be hoped the Mayor and the Treasurer will do justice to the public apprehension in the premises without further delay. The above disposition of the Loan is not put forward as a correct statement; it is a suggestion according with the popular sentiment; and if at variance with the fact, they have the means within the compass of their own knowledge to correct it. Let them do so, we shall be glad if they can.

The New Town Council.

The Councillors who were elected are Messrs. Bradfield, Harvey, and Carlysle, for the North Ward; Burnham, Poole, and Hogan, for the South Ward; Hopkins, Hall, and Leary, for the East Ward; and Hall, Stevenson, and Scott, for the Centre Ward. Mr. Scott, it is believed cannot hold his seat, he being a lessee of town property. Another person will therefore be yet selected to make up the complement for the Centre Ward.

Extraordinary Murder and Suicide.

From the London Morning Star, Dec. 12.

On Thursday morning at an early hour, a murder and suicide of a most tragical and distressing character took place at Thornton Heath, about a mile distant from the town of Croydon.

For some years past, Mrs. Mary Smither, a lady of some property, and her two sons, one William Helton Smether, aged 33, and the other Charles Smether, aged 13, occupied the house No. 49, Thornton Heath, and the family were remarkable for the love and affection which seemed to subsist between them. William Helton, the elder son, has been a clerk in the Bank of England, from which establishment he received a salary of £200 per annum, and Charles has been engaged in the factory of Mr. Bunnitt, engineer, Deptford, preparatory to his entering the Bank of England also, which he expected to do in a few weeks.

William has been remarkable for his steadiness and general deportment, until very recently, when unfortunately a total change came over him, and for some days preceding the awful tragedy in which he was the principal actor, he was known to drink a bottle of brandy each day. This change there can be no doubt has been occasioned by his becoming a speculator on 'Change, and the ill luck which attended these speculations. On one time bargain alone he is said to have lost as much as £70 and this sum he borrowed in the beginning of the week to pay over to his stock broker. His losses it would seem were considerable, for, from some papers found it appears that assignments were prepared for the disposal of some life policies, and a bill for £500 for acceptance from a gentleman in the city, were found among them.

It has been his William's custom to sleep down stairs, but from some cause or other, he for some nights preceding the unfortunate occurrence slept with his brother, on the first floor, a proceeding objected to by his mother, who insisted on his resting in his own bed, and on Thursday night the unfortunate lady called out to her younger son, and asked "if William had gone to his own room," and the answer, though not true, was in the affirmative.

Nothing, however, occurred on that night to excite suspicion or alarm. The mother and brothers went to bed as usual, and on the following morning about 7 o'clock the servant, Eliza Morgan, was awoke as she thought by a noise in her mistress's room, and she at once got up and commenced her domestic work. In about a quarter of an hour afterwards she heard a knocking at the bed room of Mr. Charles, and on going there Mr. William asked her for a wine glass, which she took to him, and returned to the kitchen to prepare breakfast. Having waited sometime beyond the usual time at which the family came to breakfast, she went to the bed room of Charles and listened for a moment or so, and hearing no noise, she pushed the door open, and the first that caught her view was the countenance of her young master, with a quantity of colored foam about the mouth and nostrils.

The sight so alarmed her that she retured from the room, and at once ran to the house next door for assistance, and returned with the servant man. Both persons then entered the bedroom where they found both the brothers perfectly lifeless, and a phial and a wine glass on the foot of the bed. The first exclamation of the servant was, that she was sure the shock would kill her mistress, and hesitated for a few moments as to how she should break it to her. In a few moments, however, she summoned resolution, and proceeded to her mistress's bedroom, on the same floor, and on entering it, shocking to relate, found the unfortunate lady numbered amongst the dead also. She lay on the bed with her head resting on her right hand, the bed perfectly unruffled, and it was evident that the potent and deadly poison had an instantaneous effect and that she died without a struggle.

Though no human aid could have been of the slightest avail, medical aid was sought after, but it was quite an hour before it could be procured, and at the end of that time Mr. Bottomley, of Croydon, made his appearance and pronounced all three dead.

Inspector Alexander Frazer, of the P. division of police, stationed at Croydon, was soon on the spot, and took charge of the house and the property, and on learning that Mr. Bottomley had taken away a letter written by the deceased, and also the phial which had contained the prussic acid, he expressed some astonishment and dissatisfaction, particularly as he had not been able to ascertain whether the label on the bottle bore the name of any chemist.

It appears that Mrs. Smither had been ailing for some days, and that her son William had been in the habit of giving her the medicine prescribed for her illness, and by this means had been enabled to give her the fatal dose, which must, in a moment, have terminated her existence. It is the opinion of those who had seen him, that the fatal drug must have been poured into the mouth of Charles while he lay on his back, and that the sudden shock to the circulation had caused the foam about the mouth and nostrils. It is also believed that the quantity of prussic acid taken by the unfortunate murderer himself was so great that his death was instantaneous.

Information of the tragical event has been forwarded to Mr. Carter, the coroner, but no time is yet mentioned for the holding of the inquest.

Thrilling Account of the Relief of Lucknow.

From Le Pays of Paris.

I give you the following account of the relief of Lucknow as described by a lady, one of the rescued party:—On every side death stared us in the face; no human skill could avert it any longer. We saw the moment approach when we must bid farewell to earth, yet without feeling that unutterable horror which must have been experienced by the unhappy victims at Cawnpore. We were resolved rather to die than to yield, and were fully persuaded that in twenty-four hours all would be over. The engineers had said so, and all knew the worst. We women strove to encourage each other, and to perform the light duties which had been assigned to us, such as conveying orders to the batteries and supplying the men with provisions, especially cups of coffee, which we prepared day and night. I had gone out to try to make myself useful in company with Jessie Brown, the wife of a corporal in my husband's regiment. Poor Jessie had been in a state of restless excitement all through the siege, and had fallen away visibly within the last few days. A constant fever consumed her, and her mind wandered occasionally, especially that day, when the recollection of home seemed powerfully present to her. At last overcome with fatigue, she lay down on the ground, wrapped up in her plaid. I sat beside her, promising to awaken her when, as she said "her father should return from the plowing." She fell at length into a profound slumber, motionless and apparently breathless, her head resting in my lap. I myself could no longer resist the inclinations to sleep in spite of the continual roar of the cannon. Suddenly I was aroused by a wild unearthly scream close to my ear; my companion stood upright beside me, her arms raised, and her head bent forward in the attitude of listening. A look of intense delight broke over her countenance, she grasped my hand, drew me towards her, and exclaimed—"Dinna ye hear it? dinna ye h

The Rochester Murder.

Mrs. Littles has made a revelation somewhat in detail, purporting to show the motive and circumstance attending the murder of her husband.

We copy from the Democrat:

It is known that Ira Stout came to this city immediately after his discharge from the Pennsylvania Penitentiary. To his acquaintances the fact of his recent disgrace was unknown, and he was greatly troubled lest in some way it should be made public. This anxiety was frequently betrayed to his own family, but more particularly to Mrs. Littles, to whom he was in the habit of confiding his secrets, and making known his troubles. He believed his imprisonment was unknown except by his own relatives, and he feared nothing from any of them except his brother-in-law Littles. The quarrels of the latter with his wife led Ira to fear that, in a moment of passion, and to punish his wife for refusing to live with him, disclose this unpleasant circumstance in his history; and it is probable that the frequent calls of Ira upon Mr. Littles, at the office of the latter, and the manifestations of kind feelings, were intended to establish a friendship which would be a security against such a disclosure, whatever may be the relations between Littles and his wife. But after all, he felt insecure. He knew that Littles could at any moment destroy his standing, and his uneasy state of mind was well known to his sister, Mrs. Littles, and to other members of the family.

Some months since, Mrs. Littles intimated to Ira her intention of going West, in order, if possible, to get beyond the reach and knowledge of her husband, and there is reason to suppose that this was about the first time that Ira thought of murder as a means of disposing of Littles; or if he had ever contemplated the crime, the awful secret had been locked up in his own heart. The intimation of his sister's wish, however, to be entirely rid of her husband, emboldened Ira to speak to her of his purpose to kill him. In reply to her intimation about going West, he once said that, "If Littles should some time be put out of the way—there would be no need of her going West to get rid of him."

We are unable to give, in detail, at the periods of their occurrence, all that passed between Ira and Mrs. Littles upon the subject, from this time until the awful crime was perpetrated; but the various ways in which it could be accomplished, with safety to themselves, were of course considered. The upshot was the adoption of a plan to decoy Littles to the spot where the murder was perpetrated, with the idea that he would there discover satisfactory evidence of the improper intimacy of his wife with some other persons. In this respect, the general surmise has correctly anticipated the substantial truth of the case.

Mrs. Littles went to the ground below Falls Field a little before 9 o'clock on the evening of Saturday, Dec. 19th, and was soon followed by Ira Stout and Littles—the former armed with an iron weapon, supposed to have been unknown to Littles, and the latter with a piece of a chair found on the spot. On reaching the ground, a favorable position was sought by Ira, and the blows quickly given, which felled Littles and almost instantly proved fatal. Littles never had the opportunity to resist or defend himself, and the blows were repeated until he had almost ceased to struggle.—Mrs. Littles may assert, and probably will, that she was not aware that murder was intended; but the conversation with Ira, and her lonely visit to the appointed spot, are almost conclusive against her on this point. She did not strike a blow, and beyond a doubt was shocked and frightened when the terrible deed was done. The mangled body of her husband, and the consciousness of being guilty of the murder as an accessory, for a moment overcame her, and she passed through a scene which no pen can adequately depict.

Ira immediately dragged the body to the precipice, and not being familiar with the ground, fell down with it, a distance of nearly thirty feet, his shoulder and his arm striking so as to break the latter, as has heretofore been described. In his terror he called to Mrs. Littles, and she not fully comprehending the cause or extent of the calamity, started to go to his assistance, and before being aware of danger, she, too, went down the precipice, and in the fall, broke her wrist, and sustained other slight injuries. The bruises upon Mrs. L's face, &c., were caused by the fall. Her nose bled profusely, and her clothes were probably made bloody from this rather than by the blood from her murdered husband.

Ira was for some time entirely helpless, having fainted away. He believed himself to be dying, and so told Mrs. Littles. He, however, recovered sufficiently to drag and roll Littles' body to the water, assisted we presume, (though of this we are not positively informed) by Mrs. Littles. The latter got down to the oblique path with great difficulty, and her torn skirt, broken comb, lost rosette, and the burs in her clothes and hair, are accounted for by this fall, and by the subsequent clambering down and along the steep bank, and then up the path to the stone quarry.

We are unable to state just now how long after the murder, before Ira and Mrs. Littles reached home on Monroe street, but it is probable the lad who testified on the trial told the truth, when he said he found them at home at half-past eleven. It is no more than reasonable to allow an hour from the time of the murder until they again reached the top of the bank, and it may have been an hour and a half. In their faint and disabled condition, it would take them at least half an hour to walk home. At half-past eleven they were still sitting up, and from that time till the surgeon was sent for, plans were resolved for extricating themselves from the terrible condition into which they had plunged themselves.

It will be seen that both Ira Stout and Mrs. Littles had motives for getting rid of the husband of the latter. Weak and insufficient as these motives may appear to others, it is impossible to judge how strong they may have appeared to Ira and his sister. The former stood in daily fear of an exposure which would compel him to leave the place in disgrace, while the degree of infatuation on the part of Mrs. Littles, about getting rid of her husband, and being free to accept the attention of others, must be a matter of opinion.

In conclusion, we have to say, that we are not satisfied in asserting, as we have done before, that no other person than Ira Stout and Sarah Littles were concerned in the murder. The main facts are as we have given them above, and no "confessions" implicating other parties are likely to be made, and will not be true if made.—Perhaps this may be able, before the trial, to confirm what is here said, by evidence the source of which we shall be at liberty to make public. At present, however, we can only say that we have not a doubt of the correctness of what we have stated, and we only regret now that we cannot indicate the source from which we have derived it.

Singular Death from the Bite of a Cat.

Mr. John Abel, clerk in the employ of J. B. McCreary & Co., at Lewis Audereids Colliery, Jeanesville, Luzerne Co., Pa., died on the morning of the 27th Dec., from the bite of a cat. The circumstances are very singular. About ten weeks ago he was walking from the dwelling house to the store, he met a cat in the path. He put out his hand to play with her, when she instantly flew at him and bit him. He complained a little at the time, but it passed away, and so no more was thought of it. He had at times, however, a great repugnance to water, and the mere sight of it caused a shuddering sensation. On Christmas day he dined at the hotel of Mr. David Marta, at Jeanesville, and appeared in usual health. On the morning of the 26th he complained of being sick, and took to his bed.

He suffered intense agony, trying to bite the hand which the cat had bitten ten weeks previous, and exclaiming that the sight of water made him mad—a raving maniac. His friends had to hold him to prevent his tearing his breast. Medical skill proved of no avail, and at 8 o'clock on the 27th, Sunday morning, he breathed his last.

The Song of British Heroes!

Let your voices arise ye immortalised men,
Friends of liberty and of fame,
Tell the heart-thrilling story again and again,
How you purchased your glorious name,
Mid the thundering roar of the fiery strife
On the land or the billowy main;
Whether fighting for liberty or for life
Your song it was always the same.

Chorus—Then on! on!! on!!!
To the field of fame again,
When Britannia calls we'll answer all,
And fly to the field or the main.

Oh! tell to the listening world abroad
How you conquered foreign steel,
How you fought for Liberty and for God,
While you fought for Britain's weal,
Mid the clash and the roar of the perilous fray
How firm and undaunted you stood,
Mid the flashing fire of the battle day,
In the tempest or the flood.
Then on! on!! on!!!—&c.

Oh, tell it around how in years that are past,
When Napoleon would conquer the world,
How bravely you stuck to your flag at the mast,
And o'er every sea 'twas unfurl'd;
How you conquered the Russian upon his own ground,
Who outstrip'd you in numbers by far;
How you planted your standard where Russian guns sound,
And raised higher Britannia's bright star.
Then on! on!! on!!!—&c.

Oh, speak with a voice that will traverse the earth,
That will bound over every sea:
How you fought when the rebels of India unfurl'd
Their standard and cried "We are Free;"
How you conquered their thousands by numbers so few,
And told them in accents so plain:
That their Freedom consisted in serving you true,
And in never revolting again.
Then on! on!! on!!!—&c.

And, finally, tell it in every clime
That is lighted and warmed by the sun,
That your Freedom you'll hold through the lapses of Time,
Till Time to Eternity runs;
And in future should rulers like some who have reigned,
Aspire for to conquer the world,
You will rivet him fast where Napoleon was chain'd,
And his flag in your halls shall be furl'd.
Then on! on!! on!!!—&c.

The "Times" and the Commercial Crisis.

The following remarks appear in the city article of the Times of the 18th:—

The public are astounded at the commercial disclosures on every side. Even those most conversant for years past with all the great operations of business had no idea of the degree of corruption that at each turn was defeating the efforts of the honest trader. The question is, have they yet any adequate conception of the extent to which the system has been carried? Persons are disposed to comfort themselves by the conclusion that every case of delinquency appears in print and makes a great stir, while the multitude of ordinary transactions are carried on with regularity day after day and excite no notice. There could not be a greater delusion. On all hands there is a combination to palliate and hush up the practices that have been prevalent, and no more difficult or dangerous duty could be undertaken than that of endeavouring to defeat it. Even if any class of observers happen to be aware of organized schemes of deception of the most objectionable and suspicious features in the management of companies or firms they can do little to warn the community until some open default has been committed, and the final explosion is consequently at hand. The forces that were drawn together at Glasgow, consisting of the aristocracy and wealth of Scotland, to bear down all who might attempt to question the position of the Western Bank, and to expose its vile career, furnished a specimen of the obstacles to be encountered; and it is a fact that, while that concern was applying for help to the other banks, even the statement that these banks wished to stipulate for a winding-up of its affairs was widely denounced as a malignant libel. In another case a firm whose position was understood, but which had contrived through the help of the Western Bank temporarily to arrest an exposure, induced a well-known legal house in London to protest against the damage "recklessly" inflicted on its credit by the mention of its name, although within a fortnight of that date it was shown to be disgracefully insolvent. When Mr. Oliver broke down at Liverpool, after a career of speculation, in the height of which he had been presented by his admiring townspeople with a service of plate, some of the leading merchants, including the chairman of the Borough Bank, and it is believed, Mr. De Wolf, of the great firm of De Wolfe and Co., which has just stopped for about £200,000, showing 2s in the pound for his creditors, actually posted a notice on the Exchange, contradicting and stigmatizing the announcement as a wanton injury. If this is the experience in the most rotten and hopeless cases, what would have to be expected if a breath were uttered regarding any concern that might still by possibility be patched up so as to allow of its defying all imputations? The case of the North of Europe Steam Company in which a warning to the public aggravated the injury it was intended to avert, since it drew forth an unqualified denial from the directors which led many persons to increase their investments at high prices, will be fresh in recollection. The bank is universal, and is encouraged in all quarters. There is abundant sympathy for the speculator who has lived in good style for years, and whose position may at last be questioned; but none for the great mass of the people, who in consequence of his operations have been paying higher prices for all the necessaries of life; none for those who have been tempted by high wages into over-stocked branches of labour, and who are suddenly thrown into destitution; and none for society in general, which will suffer through many future years from a generation of young men brought up to the belief that there is no such thing as honest trade, and that he is greatest who most excels in the adulteration of goods, the manufacture of accommodation bills, and the management of fraudulent companies. Such is one of the sins. The offender in his distress is a most pitiable object of pity, while the community he has wronged and dishonoured is only a shadowy conception; and Government in referring him upon its case of violating a law, merely acts on the wishes of the majority. In these circumstances it will be easily understood that the one tithe of the delinquencies that now pervade every branch of trade are likely to come to light. There is no legal machinery to promote any such object, but a most stimulative and almost resistless action on the other side. The Legislature have always been too busy in meddling as to the nature of the obligations which commercial men should be allowed to undertake to be able to devote time to the introduction of laws to enforce under swift and adequate penalties the simple principle that every obligation once made must be faithfully fulfilled, and to bring to justice every one who has robbed another by false pretences. There was much display of business in this session, but it has apparently effected nothing. The promoters of the British Bank directors was a wonderful effort to mark the inauguration of a new reign of virtue, but it is understood the experiment is never likely to be repeated, the costs of confusion having been awful. Notwithstanding all the notoriety of his case, it is easy to prophesy that Mr. Stephens, of the London and Eastern Corporation, will escape, to enjoy the remainder of his life on the marriage settlement acquired from the funds of that establishment. From the first, the other directors have never even been threatened with prosecution. It is true, the daily journals are now filled with developments of cases of sequestration or bankruptcy, or of the winding up of fraudulent concerns, but these are all exceptional, and any one reading the proceedings will see that they merely relate to a few strugglers that have been caught out of the whole army of marauders. Every word uttered in the various examinations serves to show how the individual incident was but one of a constantly extending circle—how he was terrified into lending more money, or granting further acceptances by creditors who threatened to fail and expose him, and how he in turn got more from some one else—in most cases the manager of a joint stock bank—by pursuing a similar course. In one case, now pending at Glasgow, a house is shown to have had seventy-five real or fictitious correspondents, all insolvent like itself, upon whom it had drawn to the amount of £380,000, the whole finally centering in the Western Bank. Is this a solitary specimen? Are there not hundreds of analogous but more adroit cases that might be developed on every side—often apparently, without much difficulty, if any judgment may be formed from the leading figures lately presented in some of the London balance-sheets; and as soon as the present crash is over, will not all these persons again go to work? In the present state of the law there is nothing to obstruct and everything to encourage them. The belief is that, notwithstanding the recent wrecks and the lateness of the period to which the "relief" granted by the suspension of the Bank Charter Act was deferred, the accommodation papers still in circulation in London and throughout the kingdom would present a total such as few persons not accustomed to reflect on such matters would be prepared to expect. The remedy, of course, would be to punish the drawers and acceptors for conspiracy to do fraud. Every bill of exchange purports to have been for "value received." If two men conspire to manufacture such a document and to pass it as genuine into the hands of a third, nothing can be more obvious than the nature of the transaction. But Parliament, perhaps would rather pass a whole session in discussing whether they would devise some new measures to interfere with the natural course of enterprise, and direct it into such channels as might be fashionable with them for the moment, than descend to so small a matter as this simple application of the criminal law.

The Russian Serfs.

One of the subjects that just now most preoccupy the German press, and generally that of all the north of Europe, is the probability of the emancipation of the Russian serfs. The Elberfelder Zeitung has lately given several details upon this project, and, amongst others, it would seem that the following points are almost definitively conceded:—First,—The serf may marry freely, whether his master consent or not; or he may refuse to marry when his master insists upon his marrying. Secondly,—No corporal punishment to be inflicted, save upon the sentence of a tribunal. Thirdly,—The master to be prevented from taking a serf from the plough, in order to transform him into a private servant. Fourthly,—The serf to be authorized to refuse to leave his place of residence at the master's behest. These four points seem to be at present the limit of what will be done in the way of emancipation; and, however we may revolt from the notion of any individual's personal freedom being so restricted, it must be confessed that more than this might, perhaps, be scarcely prudent for the government to do, all at once, without transition. Ever since the peace, the one overruling preoccupation of Alexander II. has been the question of emancipation. For years—long before his father's death—the present Czar has had his mind's eye fixed upon this and upon all the questions of interior administration that are so important in a country like Russia; but his advent to the throne in the midst of the war left him free to attribute the vote to any other considerations save those of obtaining the most honorable peace that could be brought about. The peace once signed, the Czar has taken to heart, and most seriously so, the reforms to be introduced into the internal policy of his empire, and those who have all his life been admitted into his closest intimacy, pretend even that the general health has severely suffered from the intensity of his reflections upon what may be the course pursued in order to aid the progress of the nation over which he rules.

There is also no slight degree of exaggeration in all that it is the fashion to say and write upon serfdom in Russia. No doubt the condition of a serf is not to be compared to that of a free man; but it is neither so abject nor so unprotected a one as the demagogic scribes would have their readers to believe. There is control over the landed proprietors that, out of Russia, few people are perhaps aware of. In every province is a personage called a marechal de la noblesse, who is a kind of justiciary; when a peasant, or a number of peasants have to complain of their lord, they apply to this "marshal of nobility," and put the cause in his hands; he convokes several of his colleagues (sometimes ten or twelve) and they sit in judgment on the lord. Their decrees are frequently so severe that they go the length of depriving the proprietor of the administration of his estates, and award him only a pension upon his revenue. For more than a quarter of a century there has been no complaint that the marshals of nobility had shown themselves too lenient to the landowners. All this is an imperfect form of justice, still it is a guarantee for the present, and, if you add to this the prevalence of the abrok, or system of liberation by payment, in nine-tenths of all Russian estates, you will see that those writers exaggerate who paint the serfs of Russia as "subject to treatment which likens them to beasts of the field."—Paris Correspondent of the Manchester Guardian.

The Leviathan.

The attempts to move this monster ship were renewed on Tuesday, the 15th, but were again unsuccessful. At half-past three all the chains were hove taut, including the great cables laid across the river, and hydraulic presses and numerous screw-jacks were set in motion, but not the slightest effect was produced. When the strain was at the highest, one of the smaller chains gave way, and a feeder of a hydraulic engine burst. Operations were suspended, and at five p. m. arrangements were made to drive in piles near the after-cradle, probably with the view of fixing another press.

On Wednesday morning, after a few minutes application of the rams, the Leviathan moved 38 inches aft and 15 inches forward, the effect being to place the vessel straight on the rails, and to remove all suspicion of obstruction of the ways. Two hydraulic cylinders then broke, and up to half-past two no further progress had been made. Mr. Robert Stephenson was again present, and expressed his approval of the proceedings. Further proceedings will probably be postponed until after Christmas, when vastly increased power is to be employed.

It is now said that the Leviathan will cost only from £220,000 to £225,000 in the launching—not £70,000 or £80,000, as reported.

Law—the Perfection of Human Reason.—At the recent term of the circuit Court of Tazewell, Tenn., a fellow was arraigned for stealing a raw-hide. He alledged that he had purchased it from a negro. The attorney for the commonwealth admitted his statement, and he was acquitted, but was immediately indicted for trading with a negro. Thereupon the accused introduced two witnesses to prove that he had stolen the hide, when he was of course challenged; and having already been tried for stealing, he could not be tried a second time for the same offence, and was cast upon the country.

Charles Mathews' Advice to the Americans.—Charles Mathews made a speech in Boston, three weeks ago, in which he said: "I am somewhat unlucky in timing my visits to America. In 1838, some nineteen years ago, I first crossed the Atlantic, and popped upon a pecuniary crisis in New York; and now, in 1857, I have had the luck to pop upon another. It seems as if my presence were doomed to bring a panic with it—(great laughter)—but I am happy to find at any rate that it has not had the effect of frightening you out of the theatre. (Laughter and applause.) Indeed ladies and gentlemen, I think the best thing you can do is to come into it as often as possible, and to divert your mind for an hour or two from the cares of real life.—In times of difficulty, so far from its being an expensive luxury, the theatre is about the cheapest mode you can adopt of passing your leisure moments. During one of our hardest winters in London a poor man was observed almost every night, to the surprise of the money-taker, paying his 3d, to the gallery of the Surry Theatre. At last, out of curiosity, he got into conversation with him. 'How is it,' said he, 'that you, who appear to be a very poor man, can afford to come and pay your money here night after night, when one would think that you had hardly enough to keep life and soul together at home?' 'That's it,' said he, 'I come here out of economy. (Laughter.) It's the cheapest way I can spend my evenings. At home I must burn fire and candle, and have something to eat and drink for myself and friend, and at an expense of 2s. or 3s. at the least; while here I get warmed, lighted, lodged and amused with plenty of good company around me, and all for 3d.' There was philosophy in this, ladies and gentlemen, and I recommend it to your serious consideration." (Much laughter.)

A Snug Little Fortune.—Mr. Martain, of London is being put in the possession of the Jenning's property, which for so very long a period has been without a recognized heir. The cash he inherits amounts to the gigantic sum of $80,000,000, while his income will be $1,250,000 per annum. That is something like a fortune. The lucky inheritor has been wretchedly poor all his preceding life.—The property which Mr. Martain inherits has been doubling year after year, while every effort has been made to find the rightful heir. The Jennings on this side of the Atlantic have held numerous meetings on the subject, and we believe sent one or two agents to Europe to establish their claims.

The Bombay Times states that one of the sons of the King of Delhi has escaped.

Miss Malleson, a passenger on board the Canada, bound for India, where she was going in join her brother, landed with a party of friends at Port Louis; in putting off to the vessel in the evening, the boat was run down by a tug, and she received injuries which occasioned her death.

The Pays states that the British troops sent from England to India, via Egypt had arrived at Aden from Malta in twelve days. Stores and a hospital had been established at Aden for the reception of those troops.

Exeter Hall Services.

From the London Spectator.

Apart from the question of local authority, which is not to be dismissed either by a legal argument or a sarcasm, a question may well be entertained whether it is desirable to carry on the Church service as a kind of public entertainment to vie either with Mr. Spurgeon on the one hand or the Oratorio on the other. As to the motives upon which the members of the Sacerial Service Committee have acted, there can be no doubt: their desire is to spread religion, and they believe that if they carry its ministrations to the people, it cannot fail to do good. There can, however, be as little doubt, that in being thus placed among public entertainments, the Church service becomes subjected to a natural tendency to find attractions in meretricious accessories. It cannot be desirable for any religious community to enter into competition with the Spurgeon class of ebullitions. The public may be caught, but the question is whether it is desirable to render the Church service, or any other religious form, a trap. Some part of the congregation mustered in Exeter Hall was undoubtedly drawn from churches, although the clergymen expressed a hope to the contrary,—this fact appears to be admitted: the concert-room not only competed with the parish-church, but drew away the congregation, and the religious office thus far degenerated into a public entertainment. It is questionable, too, whether those persons who were drawn into Exeter Hall, but who would not be drawn into church, attended with any religious feeling, or acquired any religious feeling by the kind lesson. Some might do so, others would not. Among the majority of such persons, the lesson would only be accepted as long as it is amusing, and the clergyman could only "draw" like an actor. This places the clerical office upon a footing with melodrama or light comedy; and it tends not only to demoralize the audience, but to lower the clergy in their style and feelings as well as in their influence.

Remarkable Land Slide at Catskill.—A remarkable land slide took place at Catskill, on Sunday, about noon. Five acres of land on the hill-side adjoining the brick yard of Dr. Ensign, on the west side of the Catskill Creek, caved down a distance of 60 feet, and continued to slide for at least one-fourth of a mile, until reaching the foot of the hill it ran completely under the surface, upheaving a very large kiln containing 200,000 of brick, and demolished sheds, yards, trees, &c., in its course. Some three acres of land on the hill-side have sunk, the surface being from 50 to 60 feet lower then previously, leaving the whole face of the ground broken into ridges and deep chasms. Three large trees were carried down a distance of 300 feet and left standing erect, to all appearances as though they had never been moved. It is a singular fact that at the time of the slide, Mrs. Rufus Holbrook and her daughter were on the ground, with immense gulfs opening all around them and received no injury. It is supposed by some that under the ravine was a quicksand bottom, which has received the immense mass of earth that seems entirely to have sunk.

The Suspended British Banks.

Cor. of the New York Commercial Advertiser.

The efforts to re-establish the City of Glasgow Bank seems likely to be successful, but the Western Bank of Scotland will most probably be abandoned to its fate as a hopeless concern. The capital of the City of Glasgow Bank is $6,800,000, and its liabilities to depositors and others are about $20,000,000. Its friends and directors assert that it has sustained no severe losses, and that its stoppage was occasioned merely by the run which followed the closing of the Western Bank of Scotland, and for which they had not prepared a sufficient reserve. An independent committee is to examine into these statements and to report in a few days. Should they be confirmed, the depositors will agree to a delay of four months, and the Bank will almost immediately re-open for general business.

The Western Bank of Scotland, on the other hand, has taken no steps to present a fair statement of accounts to the public, and the representations of its partizans and of all connected with it, have been so unscrupulous, and so evidently intended to promote concealment and beget false impression of the value of its assets, that they have produced a directly opposite effect. The capital of this concern was $7,500,900, and its debts to depositors and others amount to about $30,000,000. As the whole of the shareholders—about 1500 in number—are individually liable, and several of them are persons of very large property, all the creditors are certain of payment in full, but it will be at the cost of great individual suffering.

The Northumberland and Durham District Bank, which stopped about ten days since, has not yet presented any statement, but it is known that this fair will turn out among the worst ever exhibited. Its capital was about $3,400,000, and its liabilities are equal to about $12,500,000. The belief is that it has scarcely a single available asset on hand. All that it possesses are claims on colleries and iron works to which it has made advances, and of course the realization of properties of this description must, under the best circumstances, be tedious, and in times like the present, practicable only at an immense sacrifice. It is said that to one concern the Bank has advanced $500,000 in excess of its entire capital. The shareholders are about 300 or 400 in number, of whom more than 100 are women. They are all responsible to their last shilling.

The whole of the misery caused by these institutions may be attributed to the law of unlimited liability which is still applicable to banks, but to no other trading corporations. Owing to the consciousness that an immense body of unsuspecting shareholders are answerable for every liability that may be incurred, the acceptances and endorsements of such concerns pass current among the London discount houses, without the slightest examination as to the real character of the transactions involved. In this way each bank may be said to wield unbounded credit, and as the conduct of its transactions is usually left to a single manager, who is commonly selected rather for his pretensions than for his age, experience or moral qualities, the result may easily be conceived.

These men in fact hold in their hands uncounted millions, since they represent the entire property of their constituents, whom they can reduce to beggary at will.—If a bank depended for its credit solely on the amount of its paid up capital, and its reputation for honest management, it would be trusted just in proportion to its deserts, and all possibility of such events as those which are now scattering confusion and sorrow would be at an end.

The Wolverhampton and Staffordshire Bank, another joint stock concern which lately failed, is making exertions to resume, which will perhaps be successful. Its capital is $500,000, and any loss that might be occasioned by his permanent break up would fall chiefly in the iron districts.

Popish Bishop's Grandiloquence on the Indian Mutiny.—"James by the mercy of God and favor of the Holy Apostolic See, Bishop of Limyra, and Vicar Apostolic of the Eastern District in Scotland', has issued one of his usual grandiloquent charges to the faithful, enjoining public prayers on occasion of the Indian mutiny. It opens thus:—"But yesterday, and the name of England filled the world with wonder and envy; for she rose above it, as rise the cedars on Lebanon, and her glory was as theirs. No hostile breath yet ruffled the surface of her ocean-wide prosperity. No rebel hand was lifted to pluck a single jewel from her crown. Her ships were upon every sea, her mariner's song upon the far-off wave; and like a child of play, her flag floated careless to the breeze from every promontory." This is a sample of the stock.

Small-Pox Patients in Prussia.—A curious law-suit is going on just now in Berlin. A rich banker of that city who is ill with the small pox, has had two actions brought against him, one by his barber, and the other by his upholsterer, who claim damages because he communicated the malady to them. They demand compensation for the doctor's expenses and the time they have lost. According to the Prussian law, the banker was bound to hang up outside his door a notice with the words "There is a person here ill of the small pox."

Missing.—William H. Russell, proprietor of the Russell House, Detroit, visited New York December 12th, and put up at the Astor House. The next day he paid his bill and went out, leaving his baggage. He has not been heard of since, and the Detroit people think he is either insane or murdered.

☞ The price of slaves is greatly declining in the Southern States. The Richmond (Virginia) despatches give the following prices, lately obtained in that city, as about the standard rate at which slaves are sold, but which, however, is not much more than half what they would bring six months ago. A No. 1 field hand, black, 22 years old, $620. No. 2, a woman, stout and healthy, a good cook, $475. No. 3, a No. 1 brown, fancy woman, 26 years, good seamstress $530. No. 4, man and wife, 40 and 30, man slightly unsound, taken in at $970 for the pair. No. 6, a man, about 27, $416. Little niggers from 5 to 7 years, so low that they are generally sold in lots by the dozen ☞ Slavin, who was hung recently at St. Johns, N. B., for the murder of the McKenzie family, confessed that, after the elder members of the family had been butchered, a little girl, about three years old, innocently held up her doll and offered it to him if he would not kill her. The little innocent's offer was refused, and the inhuman monster murdered her!

☞ We have a report from St. Louis of a terrible battle in Kansas between General Lane's forces and the United States dragoons, at Sugar Mound, in which, it is said, several of the latter were killed. It is also reported that the dragoons retreated, and that Governor Denver had sent four companies of infantry to assist them—moreover, that the Free State men, to the number of 2,500, had rallied in support of Lane, and that a fearful collision was expected.

☞ There are in the harbor of Cork, Ireland, on shipboard, seeking purchasers, the enormous quantity of 8,596 tons of wheat, 9,188 sons of Indian corn, 3,073 tons of barley, and 869 tons of oats, besides immense quantities of beans, rice, sugar, fruit, and other articles of household consumption.

A child beginning to read becomes delighted with a newspaper, because he reads the names of things which are familiar, and will make progress accordingly. A newspaper in one year is worth a quarter's schooling to a child.

Dr. Livingstone.—Dr. Livingstone has this week sailed from Lisbon, in order to make arrangements with the Portuguese Government relative to the navigation of the Zambesi river and commercial intercourse with those regions of the interior whom the coast is under the crown of Portugal. The enlightened interest already taken in African explorations by the King of Portugal and his ministers leaves little doubt of the success of this mission of Dr. Livingstone, who carries with him private letters of the highest weight, as well as the official papers of Lord Clarendon and the British Government. Dr. Livingstone intends to return for a short time to this country, before finally starting for the scene of his scientific and missionary labors.—Literary Gazette

Bigamy at Bradford.

A SINGULAR WEDDING CEREMONY.

Thomas Hitchen (40) was indicted for bigamy at Bradford, on the 8th December, 1853. The prisoner married his lawful wife, who is still living, at Bristol, on the 4th June, 1848, and the 7th December, 1851, he was married to Ann Baldwin, at the Bradford Parish Church. The greatest possible amusement was created in Court by the cross examination to which Ann Baldwin was submitted by the prisoner. Does not remember the clergyman saying, say after me? Yes. "Didn't we get on cheek by jowl until we got towards "I will" and didn't I say "I shant." (Loud laughter.) Witness: That's true. (Renewed laughter.) Prisoner: Then he says, "I won't marry you to-day, and I said, "then you shan't marry me to-morrow." (Laughter.) Didn't I? Witness: Yes. Prisoner: Then he said "stand down," and I stood down, and the ring slipt out of my fingers. Who picked it up and put it on your finger? Didn't Billy Welsh? (Laughter.) Witness: I don't remember. Prisoner: Now, you ought to remember: didn't Billy Welch put on the ring? Witness: Praps he did. Prisoner: Doesn't thou remember asking me if I would not go again, and be wed out? Witness: No. Prisoner: Didn't you offer me a sovereign to get wed out? Witness: Yes, I did. (Renewed laughter.) Prisoner: Didn't I say I wouldn't pay until he had finished the job? Witness: Yes, thou did. Prisoner: Doesn't thou remember coming laughing and saying "He's taken it brass, and we are to go to-morrow." Witness: No, I don't. Prisoner: Didn't the people say we weren't married? Witness: I can't remember. Mr Dr. Dearsley: Was the ring put on by the prisoner? Prisoner (interrupting): Was it put on by me or did Billy Welsh put it on? Witness: Billy Welsh. (Loud laughter.) By the Judge: How was it Billy Welsh came to put the ring on the finger. Mr Dearsley: It fell down my lord; Billy Welsh picked it up and put it on her finger. The prisoner was ordered to stand down, and Billy Welsh went on with the ceremony. (Laughter.) There was a dozen married at the same time, and I dare say the clergyman did not notice the change. They all met on the ring together. (Renewed laughter.) The judge read over the evidence of this woman before the committing magistrate, in which she distinctly swore that the marriage was regularly solemnized, and other witnesses were called to prove that her statements in cross examination were not true. The prisoner, in his defence, said he neither put on the ring, nor paid any money, and he did not consider he was married. The clergyman told me to say "I will," and I said "I shant." The Judge asked the jury whether they did not think her statements had been made to shield the prisoner? The jury said they did not believe the woman, and they returned a verdict of guilty, recommending the prisoner to mercy, for what reason the foreman could not inform the Court. His lordship deferred sentencing the prisoner.—Halifax Guardian.

The Results of the Crimean War.—The Times' correspondent writes from the City of the Sultan:—"In spite of the neutralization of the Black Sea, and in spite of the steamers of the four regular steam companies to Trebizonde, the Caucasus is still the old land of fable and romance, wrapped up in mystery almost as dark as when Jason & Co. made their exploring trip and brought back their tales of wonder from the shores of Colchis. Every now and then an antique-looking, weather-beaten craft, with high rounded prow and higher poop, reminding one forcibly of Greek galleys, comes down the Bosphorus with swelling sails and a strange-looking crew, concealing its mysterious cargo as the Argonauts of old did their golden fleece. It drops its anchors at Tophkane, and discharges a number of closely-wrapt-up beings, accompanied by tall handsome men in tight-fitting dress coats and enormous fur caps, armed with sword and dagger. They come from the Caucasus, and bring black-eyed jewels for the harems of Stamboul.—There is, indeed an imperial order to forbid their importation, but it is like the treaty of Paris ordering the neutralization of the Euxine and ignoring the blockade of the coast of Circassia.

The Coal Fields of North America.—According to a statement made by Professor Rogers, the number of coal seams in Nova Scotia is about fifty, though only five of them are of workable thickness, being equivalent to about twenty feet of coal. The deepest anthracite basin of Pennsylvania, that of the Schuylkill, contains also about fifty seams, and twenty-five of these have a thickness each of more than three feet, and are available for mining. Further west, the great Appalachian, or the Pennsylvania coal field, contains about twenty beds in all, ten of which are thick enough to be mined. Still further onward, the broad basin of Indiana and Illinois shows apparently not more than ten or twelve beds, and it is believed that only seven of these are thick enough and pure enough for mining. Northward, in the Michigan coal field, there are only two or three layers, and these lie so low that the expense of draining mines by pumping will long forbid successful coal mining in that locality. Still further westward, the coal field of Iowa and Missouri contains, it is believed, but three or four beds of profitable size, and the total number, thick and thin, does not exceed six or seven. A similar gradation characterizes the general size of the individual coal seams, by far the thickest being in the anthracite basin of eastern Pennsylvania.

Tavern Licenses.

AN ACT TO AMEND THE LAW RELATIVE TO THE INSPECTORS OF HOUSES OF PUBLIC ENTERTAINMENT

20th Vic. Cap. 70.

[Assented to 10th June, 1857.

Whereas it is expedient to amend the Act thirteenth and fourteenth Victoria, chapter sixty-five, amending the law relative to Tavern Licenses in Upper Canada, in so far as it relates to the election of Inspectors of Public Entertainment, by providing that hereafter such Inspectors shall be appointed by the Municipalities, instead of being elected by the people as heretofore: Therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council and assembly of Canada, enacts as follows:

I. After the present year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, so much of the said Act as empowers the Municipal Electors to elect Inspectors of Houses of Public Entertainment in any Municipality in Upper Canada, shall be repealed, and it shall be lawful for the Council of each Municipality to appoint annually one or more fit and proper persons to be such Inspectors, who shall hold office during the year for which the said Council shall have been elected, and any vacancy occurring during the said year shall be filled as aforesaid by the said Council, for the remainder of the period such Council shall continue in office.

II. It shall be lawful for the Municipalities in Upper Canada, by By-law, to fix and define the duties, powers and privileges of the Inspectors so appointed by them, the remuneration they shall receive, and the security to be given for the efficient discharge of the duties of their office; such By laws not being contrary to the laws of Upper Canada.

III. The person or persons to be appointed Inspectors shall possess the same property qualification as is now required for the Councillors of the Municipality which shall appoint the same.

IV. So much of the hereinbefore cited Act as is inconsistent with this Act shall be, and the same is hereby repealed.

A Sermon Preached before Royalty.—By her Majesty's command a sermon preached before the Court in the parish church of Crathie, on the 11th October, has just been published. The author is Dr. Robert Lee, the professor of Biblical Criticism in the University of Edinburg; and the subject is—"What Christianity teaches respecting the Body." Dr. Lee shows that the care of the body is declared in the Bible to be a Christian duty, and that the manner in which this care is to be bestowed is taught by God in the uniformity and constancy of the laws of Nature. By violating these laws an enormous amount of misery and premature death are occasioned. It is reckoned says Dr. Lee, "that one hundred thousand persons die annually in England of preventible disease. In the same proportion more than a million and a quarter must die annually from the same causes in Europe. * * * Probably not fewer than four hundred thousand men were killed during the late Russian war. But during the same period ten times as many died in Europe alone from preventable diseases. The slaughter of four millions of persons during three years, in a war against the laws of health! So appalling a fact is surely deserving the earnest attention, not only of governors, politicians and philanthropists, but of all men who profess Christianity and especially of those who are appointed to teach it; because the laws of health, through disobedience to which such multitudes perish, are God's laws, for be not only ordained them, but he executes them impartially and universally, before our eyes, and upon ourselves." Facts leading to similar conclusions, but of a more encouraging character, are then briefly presented. Reference is made to the increased duration of human life in this country within the present century, as shown by the statistics of life insurance companies. The greater longevity of modern times is pointed out, not to depend upon a capriciousness in the ways of Providence, but on the community's better acquaintance with observance of the laws which determine the preservation of the body. Allusion is made to certain features in the history of the last visitation of this country by cholera. Towns and even tenements were exempted in proportion to their compliance with the requirements of the laws of health. One of the arguments by which Dr. Lee supports his proposition that the care of the body is a religious duty, is the fact that a great part of the law which God gave, through Moses, to the people of Israel, was in reality a sanitary code. The preacher then pursues his argument under the Christian dispensation.

Horrible Occurrence at a Kennel.—The following from a letter received in Banbury, contains a notice of a most extraordinary event:—"A terrible occurrence took place last week at a gentleman's house near Wimbotme, Dorsetshire, where a pack of fox hounds are kept. The dog-feeder having heard the dogs fighting in the night, left his bed, and, without dressing, went down to try to part them. They fell upon him and tore him to pieces, and then ate him. The whipper in could not make out next day what had become of the poor fellow, until he went into the kennel, and there found his head and one of his legs only, the rest being eaten by the hounds.

ELLIS'S PATENT ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material and one which can be manufactured, and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, within due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure. Those artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to be distinguished by the eye from natural stone; and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere and will continue to do so either under dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Wells, Columns, Cornices Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected AT FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed [post-paid] to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

Horrible Outrage in Suffolk, Va.

A correspondent of the South Side Democrat writing from the County of Nansemond, gives the following account of a remarkable trial:—

"The people of Suffolk were thrown into great consternation some weeks back by the news that Mr. William R. Brothers, a respected citizen, had been inhumanly assaulted and beaten in the night by two negroes unknown. When found he had crawled from his own to his brother's house, a distance of a mile and a half, and presented a truly pitiable spectacle. Several of his ribs were fractured, one of his arms broken in two places, and the hand of the other chopped entirely off. Besides this his body was battered and bruised in every direction, so shockingly that his recovery was despaired of. Though perfectly conscious, he could give no clue to the perpetrators of this fiendish deed. His own statement was this—On one of the last warm nights of the autumn he arose from his bed and made a temporary pallet on the floor; about midnight he was awakened by a tremendous blow at the door of his house, the repetition of which burst it in. As he sprang from his bed he was attacked by two powerful negroes, one of whom attempted to hold him, while the other tried to dash out his brains with an axe. By great exertion he succeeded in warding off most of the blows from his head, but they fell with a terrible effect upon his body. After a somewhat protracted struggle he found his strength rapidly failing, and discovering that the inhuman wretches were bent on taking his life, he determined that his only remaining chance was to feign death.

Relaxing his hold on the negro with whom he was struggling, he fell backwards upon the pallet, contriving, at the same time, to throw the unbroken arm over his head. Again and again the axe descended upon his body while in this position, but he resolutely suppressed every groan, or the slightest indication of life. While this was going on he heard a slight cough apparently at the window at which the negroes deserted. They then took him by the feet and dragged his body out of the house, and as one of his hands trailed across the threshold of his door one of the brutes deliberately chopped it off with a single blow of the axe. Having dragged him to a tree near his door they left him and returned to the house where they began opening drawers and smashing furniture, robbery being evidently their object.—Fearing that his blood tormentors might return and despatch him, he resolved to make an effort to escape, and notwithstanding his horrible condition he dragged himself to his brother's house, and what is most surprising of all, though with one arm broken in two places, and the hand of the other cut off, he managed to open two gates on his way.

As may have been imagined, the greatest excitement prevailed throughout the town when these facts became known, but no clue was for some time found to the perpetrators.

One day, however, a slave named Jim, belonging, I believe, to the brother of the poor victim, met a gentleman in Suffolk, and in a very excited manner, told him that he had just seen two slaves in the swamp—the Dismal Swamp, which, as you know, lies just east of us—who told him that he and another runaway had committed the deed, and that if the people at Suffolk did not make up a sum of money and send it into the swamp to him (Jim) they should all be served in like manner.

You cannot imagine the consternation which this occasioned, and the citizens were on the point of making up the sum indicated, when one more prudent than the rest suggested that if they complied with this demand, they would be continually called on for similar contributions. He asked to see Jim, and the thought struck him that he might know more of the matter than he was likely to admit. He therefore procured a warrant for his arrest and had him committed to jail. Here, under the terrors of conscience, of hope, probably of pardon, Jim made a clean breast of the affair. He said that one night a white man named Nathan Franklin sent for him at his own house. On his arriving, Franklin told him that he knew a way by which he could make more money in one night than by his over-work at shingle making a life time—that all he had to do was to kill Mr Brothers and take his money, half of which he might keep, and he knew that he had at least $800, for he had recently sold a slave for that sum. Jim says he refused at first to have anything to do with the matter.—Thereupon, Franklin told him to go and bring another negro back with him, Harvey. The proposition was also made to Harvey who plumply refused. Thereupon, they aver that Franklin plied them with liquor till they were perfectly infuriated, when they consented to do the deed. It was now midnight. The three went to Brothers' house, and committed the deed. After all they found no money. It seems that this was in the pantaloons pocket of B., and in the scuffle the clothing of the bed was thrown upon it, entirely concealing it, and it was found untouched, the next morning, by those who came to search the house. Mortified at their want of success, it would seem that they reproached Franklin, who then told them that they might make as much after all, and suggested the plan, which as I have above stated, came so near being successful but which, in fact, led to their destruction.

On their own confession they were tried at the last term of our Court—poor Brothers, who still survived, although so horribly mangled, was brought into the court room in a bed to testify.

The prisoners were convicted, sentenced, and executed in the court yard, just before the meeting of the late M. E. Conference at Elizabeth city. Franklin was, when I last heard from Suffolk, still in jail, but it is feared that through defect of evidence (no colored person's evidence being permitted in the slave States) he may still escape. The feeling there runs strong against him.

RUSSIA.—In 1862 the Czar of Russia will erect a monument commemorative of the one thousandth year of the Russian empire. The national life of ten centuries has an imposing venerable aspect. The government has always been the same, autocracy; the administration has varied according to the character and fortunes of each ruler. The devotion of the people to the sceptre is still, as heretofore, unlimited, like the imperial power—a loyalty reaching religious worship. The recent address of the Metropolitan (the high prelate) of Moscow to Alexander the II. on his visit to the capital shadows out the relations between the sovereign and the subject:—"Most pious sovereign, the heart of Russia, for you are in her bosom and heart, the orthodox people venerate you. Peace will facilitate your efforts to elevate and improve the internal life of Russia, to preserve and augment the good bequeathed to us and our ancestors. In your sacred person the orthodox church reveres the quality of her defender and protector, one of the greatest prerogatives of the Lord's anointed." In the chapel of the Convent of Miracles the Emperor and Empress remained for some time on their knees before the relics of St. Alexis. The Emperor soon after mounted his horse and reviewed the troops and cadets. Egbert, the first sole monarch of England, began his reign in 827; thus the monarchy is upwards of a thousand years. More than fourteen hundred claimed for that of France. The Republic of ancient Rome did not endure half so long.—Mr. Walsh's Letter from Paris of Nov. 26.

SINGULAR CASE OF DEATH.—The Concord, N. H. Congregational Journal gives the particulars of the death of a young lady, named Helen Kittredge, of vigorous physical powers, at Nelson, N. H. under somewhat singular circumstances. On Tuesday the 6th instant, she exhibited some symptoms of typhoid fever, then prevalent in the family. Some one proposed as a remedy, what is termed a "rum sweat."—This her anxious and affectionate mother attempted to administer. After being for a moment surrounded by the ascending hot air, she gave signs of suffering; she called to her brother who stood near for aid, upon whose arm her head fell, in a manner indicating that her life was departing. She was placed upon the bed—a gaze, and an exclamation of horror, from the almost frantic mother followed. Her idolized child—her beautiful Helen—was dead!—Alcohol has been used, and too much of it the nervous system of the sufferer seems to have been completely overpowered, and her whole body was dreadfully burned.

Modesty is a handsome dish-cover, which makes us fancy there must be something very good beneath it.

Trust and Loan Company of Upper Canada.

The half-yearly meeting of this Company was held on Wednesday, 9th of December, at the office, 65 Moorgate Street, to receive a report from the directors and to declare a dividend.

Mr. Chapman, Deputy Chairman, presided.

Mr. Macdonald, the Secretary, having read the notice convening the meeting, the seal of the Company was affixed to the registry of Proprietors.

The following report was taken as read:

The Directors beg to submit the following statement of accounts for the six months ending the 30th September, 1857. The net profits during that period amount to £8,918 19s 1d, which, added to the sum brought forward from March, gives a balance at credit of revenue of £9,230 18s 10d. It is recommended that out of this balance a dividend at the rate of 7½ per cent per annum (less income tax) be declared on the paid-up capital stock of the Company, that one-half of the surplus profits over 6 per cent per annum be put to the reserve fund in accordance with the royal charter of incorporation, and that £250 be carried to the redemption of preliminary expenses. There will then remain the sum of £145 9s 3d to the credit of the next half-year's accounts, and £14,802 16s 2d to the credit of the reserve fund. The Shareholders are fully aware of the extraordinary pressure which has weighed upon the money market during the last few months, rendering any extension of the Company's business impossible. The disasterous panic in the United States has naturally affected a mercantile community so closely connected with them as that in Canada, but the Directors have the satisfaction of expressing their conviction, that, although suffering from a temporary depression, the material interests of that Province rest upon a solid foundation. By desire of the Directors, Mr. Macdonald proceeded to Canada in the month of September last, and the result of his visit has been to confirm in the strongest possible manner their confidence in the value and security of the Company's investments in both sections of the Province, and they may add that an easy money market in England is alone required to enable them to extend operations with safety and advantage. As the current rate of interest prevents money being borrowed at a lower rate than that paid to the Shareholders as dividend, the Directors have decided on making the call of £2 per share now remaining unpaid on the new shares, notice of which is enclosed with this report.

J. H. BRAUND, Accountant.
M. SAWARD, Auditor.
J. ANDERSON, Acting Auditor.

N. B.—Under the clause of the Royal Charter of Incorporation, one-half of the profits exceeding a dividend of 5 per cent per annum, must be and is carried to a sinking fund for the redemption of the capital of the Company.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, expressed the great satisfaction he felt in being enabled to recommend to them, notwithstanding the adverse circumstances which prevailed for some time, the same dividend as was declared in July last, at the rate of 7½ per cent per annum. He need not advert to the various difficulties that had prevailed in the world since the last meeting. Looking at the astonishing reports of the disasters in the United States, it might be supposed that they extended to Canada, but he was glad to say that such was not the case. It was doubly gratifying that nothing had occurred to shake the value of the property, or any of the investments of the company. Their Secretary had recently visited Canada and the agents of the Company with a view to test the working of their system. He had had also the advantage of personal observation and examining as to the value of the securities held by the Company, and it was doubly gratifying to the Directors that the result of Mr. Macdonald's inspection had confirmed the safe position of the Company and the perfect security of their investments; and nothing but time required to bring things round into a favorable position, so as to enable the Company to realize the full amount they had invested. (Hear, hear.)

MR. MACDONALD'S DESCRIPTION OF CANADA.

Mr. Macdonald then entered into a very lucid and minute statement, giving an account of his visits to the various places in Upper and Lower Canada where the property was situated on which the Company had lent their money. He left England early in September last, and before the end of that month reached Upper Canada. He first proceeded to Montreal, thence to Quebec, and from that city through Canada West to Detroit on the River or Lake St. Clair, the extreme boundary of the province in that direction. In Canada East he found more real wealth than he expected, and a people mainly of French origin, possessing the habits of care and frugality which distinguished that race. They exhibited a great difference in their habits and manners to the Anglo-Saxon race, who had principally settled in Canada West. In Montreal he was surprised at the appearance it presented. The old town was nearly replaced by new streets and buildings that would vie with Regent Street. He found they had lent large sums of money on those buildings, but the sum lent formed but a small proportion of the cost of these buildings—sums of £500 and £600 were lent on buildings that cost £4,000 and £5,000. The loans were for the purpose of enabling the houses to be finished. Nothing could be safer than their loans in Montreal.—Their investments in Canada East were perfectly safe and satisfactory. From Montreal he proceeded by the Grand Trunk Railway to Kingston, and thence at once to the West. At places around Niagara they had some loans, and on arriving at St. Catherines, near the falls, he did not know that he had ever seen so beautiful an agricultural district. It was certainly the finest he ever saw—it was a most beautiful country. He found that their money was lent on very valuable properties, and he could scarcely understand how it was that so much ease and apparent affluence existed. From St. Catherines he went on the Great Western Railway to Brantford, and also examined their securities there. They had lent money when the prices were low, and he could not find that any of their loans or buildings had been too large—on the contrary a large margin was preserved. They had a road case in hand there which involved some litigation, but he had no doubt they would soon get it settled. From Brantford he proceeded to London, which was situated half way on the line, or about the centre of the Great Western Railway. It was the centre of the richest agricultural district in Canada. The prices of Canada produce had ruled high for some time past, the crops had been large, the farmers had made large purchases of goods; some useful and some useless, and thus locked up a quantity of money. London being so attractive, new traders opened business there, when prices were at the highest, competition ensued, and the usual results followed. He had seen the managers of the banks there, and after what he had seen and heard had come to the conclusion that the depreciation of things in London would be of the greatest value to the country; the prices of everything had run up to a preposterous amount. When he told them that the purchase of ground for a certain shop in one of the streets, about 28 or 30 feet frontage, was at the rate of £7 a foot, they would see how much the value of land in towns was run up. The agricultural interests were as sound as possible, and if the farmers had bought too much land, the difficulties would gradually disappear; at the same time the Company had no reason to complain, for of the interest due them on the 1st of October, more than half of it was paid before the 30th of that month. In fact, they had never paid them better before. He then went to Detroit, which was on one side of the River St. Clair, with Windsor on the other, united by a ferry. He thought it likely that a railway would be made to the south of the Great Western Railway over ground, which the Great Western Railway should have occupied. There were thousands of acres of rich land in that district, and an immense field for this Company's operations. The City of Hamilton was one of the prettiest he had ever seen, the hills in its vicinity were covered with beautiful country houses. They had large and good loans in Hamilton.—The city had risen from almost nothing, 20 years ago, to a very considerable place, which showed the immense progress that had been made. They had something like £25,000 lent there, and they had no difficulty with it whatever, with the exception of one bond of the corporation, but that no doubt would be arranged. In the vicinity of Hamilton they had some loans which were all secured. Toronto was the seat of Government, and a place of some importance; they had £10,000 there and in its neighbourhood. When money became easier they would open a large field for their operations in Toronto. In Belleville the same appearance of ease which he has seen in other places prevailed. Houses were in course of erection with white marble fronts, beautifully executed, as if the people did not know what to do with their money.—From Belleville he went to Montreal, and then returned to the United States. He was compelled to tell the Board as the result of his visits and investigations, that no security could be better than that which they possessed; he was, in fact, perfectly delighted with their investments; nothing could be more secure.

The Chairman said he hoped the explanation given by Mr. Macdonald was satisfactory. With regard to the call of £2 per share upon the new issue of shares stated in their report, they would perceive that it was a matter of expediency with them to raise money.

A shareholder thought that some explanation was due with respect to the call of £2 per shares: he believed that it would raise about £36,000, of which he believed £16,000 had been paid in anticipation.—It would not do to raise money to lend to the present state of banking for the purpose of discount and others, [illegible] coming due in this country.

The Chairman said, in answer, that the £36,000 was required partly for paying off debentures, but, at the same time, the hon. Proprietor must see that it would not be altogether right to stop all their operations because of the present high rate of interest. Temporary loans were very different to loans for four or five years. They had for the present confined themselves to temporary loans. It was evidently better to raise money on their shares than to sustain a positive loss by borrowing money at the present rate. It would not do to pay 10 per cent at any time. They had paid at the rate of 6 per cent per annum for the last borrowed money.

After some observations with respect to the working expenses,

Mr. Macdonald remarked that it was impossible to overrate the advantages of Lower Canada for their operations.

Mr. Unwin thought the renewal of loans very good for the Solicitors, but no advantage to the Company.

The Chairman stated that when their profits increased the expenses would not increase in anything like that proportion.

The report was then unanimously adopted and a dividend at the rate of seven and a-half per cent per annum was declared for the half-year ending the 30th of September.

A vote of thanks was then passed to the Chairman and Directors for their able management, and to Mr. Macdonald (the Secretary) for his very clear and satisfactory statement in respect to their affairs in Canada.

The meeting then separated.

Curious Biography of a Bankrupt Jack of all Trades.

From the London Times.

Among the scraps of intelligence in which the movements of distinguished persons are recorded we find the following announcement:—"Edinburgh, Monday. Court of Bankruptcy, this day. John Edward Stephens was not forthcoming this morning. The Sheriff has granted a warrant for his apprehension. It is rumored that he left for London on Sunday night." At the moment we write this illustrious citizen may be among us again in this southern division of the empire; but again Mr. John Edward Stephens may as implied by the terms of the letter "P. P. C.," change his mind and resolve to bear the brunt of the examination. We will not, therefore, as yet treat him as a runaway witness, or remark upon the disclosures he has made before the Scotch Court as to the transactions of the Eastern Bank. It will be time enough to do this when the presumption of his disappearance amounts to certainty; but we may at least be permitted to call attention to the somewhat remarkable facts of his autobiography, as they have been enunciated by himself at Edinburgh within the last few days. Mr. John Edward Stephens, then, began life as an assistant surgeon in a cavalry regiment, and a most respectable and honourable pursuit, to which it is pity for the sake of others that he did not adhere. In this capacity he served in India and elsewhere, until, finding that he could not in all probability arrive at wealth and distinction very speedily in the career which he had chosen, he resolved to abandon so barren a profession and play the game of life in a grand way. He returned to England, and in junction with Colonel Waugh, of Branksea Island, managed that remarkable institution which has been somewhat unfavourably known to the public as the Eastern Corporation, or the Eastern Bank. The ostensible object of this noble foundation was to provide, as it were, a harbour of refuge for Nabobs who were suffering from a plethora of rupees. So great was the benevolence of these strong but tender men that they resolved not to exclude the poor worn-out Indian officer with his little pension, nor Indian widow with her still smaller mite from the comprehensive action of the Eastern Bank.—The concern appears to have been carried upon the simplest plan. Prospectuses were published in India and in England, announcing in that flowing phraseology which seems to characterize operations of this nature, that if Anglo-India capitalists, high and low and more especially those of the military profession, would entrust their savings to careful guardianship of the Directors of the Eastern Bank, they would receive interest at a rate which would even make Shylock forget for a while the elopement of his daughter Jessica. There was really nothing in particular to attract confidence in this institution or in the character and position of those who had set it on foot.—What could a half-pay Dragoon and a retired assistant-surgeon be supposed to know about the principles of banking? So strange, however, is the credulity of human nature in such matters that not only women, who may, perhaps, be acquitted on the ground of their inexperience, and of other want of familiarity with business transactions, but men who had spent their lives in gathering together a little competence, hastened to throw it into this burning, fiery furnace, as though they derived some incomprehensible kind of pleasure from risking in a quarter of an hour the fruits of a life's toil under the hot Indian sun.

The concern thrived, the till was gorged, and for a while the shareholders and creditors were fed out of their own contributions and their own deposits. The system is simple as simplicity itself, and needs no further explanation. Meanwhile, the contributions and deposits were drawn out mainly by Colonel Waugh, who is now recruiting his shattered health in the kingdom of Spain. Mr. John Edward Stephens, however, did not disdain to follow in the steps of of his principals. In connection with him he entered on the trade of "sleep and forget easier," the commodities material for their trade being contributed from the soil of the Island of Branksea, but the actual material being drawn from the coffers of the Eastern Bank. Not satisfied with the western Mr. John Edward Stephens pushed his enterprising spirit into the eastern, and established branches of the Eastern Bank. A banker, as brickmaker, and watchmaker, one would have supposed that Mr. Stephens would have had enough on his hands, even giving him every credit for being a person of active mind and energetic habits. Mr. Stephens was of a very different opinion. He had become fired with the noble ambition of meeting the Erards and Broad woods and great pianoforte makers upon their own ground, and accordingly the assistant surgeon superadded to his other pursuits that of a piano-forte-maker. Another slight squeeze at the generous udder of that great milch-cow, the Eastern Bank, and the thing was done.—The story sounds like a bad joke, but we find that Mr. Stephens, even so, found time hanging heavily upon his hands, and sighed for other avocations and other trades. He next turned wharfinger; but it must not be supposed that the commencement of a new pursuit implied any dereliction of his old duties with this Encyclopedic man; to Æsculapius only was he unfaithful. Again the Bank came to his aid. Thus Mr. Stephens, the ci-devant assistant-surgeon, was now the banker, watch-maker, piano-fortemaker, clay and brick seller, and wharfinger; but even this was not enough.—There were some little spare moments of time yet which could be usefully applied, and accordingly Mr. Stephens would become an upholsterer. Advances were again obtained from the same Chancellor of the Exchequer and an upholsterer Mr. Stephens became. In none of these multifarious pursuits, however, strange to say, did he succeed, although he might almost consider that he had British India at his back. The watches would not go, the pianos were out of tune, the wharves were empty, and upholstery was not in request, the clay stuck on hand, and the last and most terrible blow of all, the Bank till began to present the appearance of a vacuum. At last it became necessary to have a slight interview with the creditors of the Bank, but upon that interview and its results we will not expatiate as yet, as the affair may be considered as before the Court until Mr. Stephens has finally declined any further conversation with the tribunals. From the terms of his letter to the trustees, an abstract of which reached us by telegraph from Edinburgh last night, it does not appear that he has actually made up his mind not to appear again before the Court. We should, however, as at present disposed, be inclined to augur unfavorably of the Scotch Sheriff's chances of further intercourse with Mr. Stephens, save, indeed, upon the contingency of a gentle but earnest compulsion.

It is not a little remarkable that a man who had so recently been found competent to carry on so many trades should so soon break down at the trade of a witness. Mr. Stephens complains that he has been so harrassed with questions that his health is giving way. Colonel Waugh's health, too, has given way, and the public will surely sympathize with this interesting pair of invalids. Mr. Stephens says, with great regret that on considering his answers he has been led to make unfounded statements to his own prejudice—so eager has he been to tell the truth; so chary of everybody's reputation save his own. He has not had time to reflect upon the circumstances of the Bank with such attention as will enable him to give proper answers to all the teasing, vexatious questions, which ingenious Scotchmen can put to him. Colonel Waugh and Mr. Stephens, Mr. Stephens doubts not, will come out of the trial a little whiter than lambs when they have the time and opportunity to place their conduct in a proper light before the public; or, at least, they will be able, as the alternative, to show that all their proceedings were sanctioned by the other Directors—a conclusion which will no doubt prove highly satisfactory to the shareholders and depositors.

The brain is the great centre of the nervous system. From it passes a double set of nerviines, which divide and sub-divide until they pervade the whole fabric. Cuvier's brain was enormous, it weighed 65 ounces; Dr. Abercrombie's, of Edinburgh, weighed 63 ounces; Lord Byron's was also very large, being 64 ounces; and Dr. Chalmers' 63 ounces. It is rather singular that the brain of Dr. Chalmers, who is justly celebrated for his attainments and profoundity, (comparatively speaking) so much lighter than that of either of the above named celebrities; but if wanting in quality, his works prove that the quality was of no ordinary kind. The skull of Rush was prodigious, measuring 24 inches in circumference, and the skull of Burns measured 22¼ inches.

Court of Queen's Bench.

WESTMINSTER, Nov. 25.

THE QUEEN v. THE PROVOST AND COLLEGE OF ETON AND ANOTHER.

There was an action of quare impedit, brought by the Attorney General against the Provost and College of Eton, and the Rev. John Alexander Clark (clerk) in order to try the right of the Crown to present to benefices avoided by the appointment of the incumbents thereof to colonial bishoprics.

The declaration was as follows:

"Be it remembered that the Provost of the College Royal of the blessed Mary of Eton, near unto Windsor, in the County of Bucks, and the same College, and also the same Alexander Clarke (clerk), were summoned to answer our Sovereign Lady the Queen of a plea that they permit our said Lady the Queen to present a fit person to the church of Stratfield-Mortimer in the County of Berks, which is void, and is in the gift of our said Lady the Queen. And therefore our Sovereign Lady the Queen, Sir Richard Bethell, Knight, Attorney-General of our said Lady the Queen prosecutes in this behalf, says that heretofore, to wit, on the 10th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1840, the said provost and college, being seized in fee of the advowson of the said church of Stratfield Mortimer, did present thereto the Rev. Henry John Chitty Harper, their clerk, who on such presentation, was duly admitted, instituted, and inducted into the same; and the said church afterwards, to wit, on the 10th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1856, became vacant by the appointment by our said Lady the Queen of the said H. J. C. Harper to be Bishop of the bishopric of Christ Church, in the colony of New Zealand, the same being within and part of the dominions of our said Lady the Queen, and by the consecration of the said H. J. C. Harper as such bishop. Whereby it then belonged, and now belongs to our said Lady the Queen, to present a fit person to the said Church as being vacant as aforesaid, but the said provost and college and the said J. A. Clarke unjustly hinder our said Lady the Queen from presenting a fit person to the said church," &c.

To this declaration the Provost and College of Eton pleaded a long plea, which in substance stated that they were seized in fee of the advowson of the living in question under a charter and letters patent of King Henry VI., confirmed by Parliament; and that on the avoidance of the benefices, by the consecration of the former incumbent, H. J. C. Harper, on the 10th of August, 1856, as Bishop of Christ Church, in New Zealand, they, the Provost and College of Eton, as patrons of the said living, presented the other defendant (the Rev. J. A. Clarke) to the said Church, who, upon such presentation was duly admitted, instituted, and inducted as perpetual vicar and incumbent. The defendant (the Rev. J. A. Clarke) pleaded a plea, in which he alleged that he was vicar and incumbent of the said Church, and that the Queen ought not to sue him, because he said that true it was that on the 10th of September, 1840, the Provost and College of Eton presented the said H. J. C. Harper to the said living, and that the same became vacant on the 10th of August, 1856, by the said consecration of the said H. J. C. Harper as such Bishop; nevertheless, the defendant said, "That the said bishopric of Christ Church was and is a bishopric lately erected and constituted, and situate wholly in parts beyond the seas, and not within any part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, and Ireland; and that after the living became vacant—viz: on the 10th of August, 1856—the Provost and College of Eton presented him (the defendant) to the said Church, upon which he was duly admitted, instituted, and inducted." To these pleas the Crown demurred, and thus raised two questions for the consideration of the Court: 1. Whether, on the avoidance of a living by the consecration of the incumbent as a colonial Bishop, the Crown had the power to present to the living so vacated; and 2, whether in this particular case the claim was not inconsistent with the original grant of the advowson to the college.

The questions were argued at great length on the 29th of May last, by the Attorney General (with whom was Mr. Welsby) on the part of the Crown; and by Sir F. Thesiger on the part of Eton College. The Court then took time to consider.

Lord Campbell now delivered the judgment of the Court as follows:—From the great importance, and novelty of the main question raised in this case we have taken time to consider it very deliberately, after the able argument addressed to us upon it by the Attorney General on one side, and Sir Frederick Thesiger on the other. There can be no doubt that on the promotion of the incumbent of a benefice in England to a bishopric in England, the benefice is so avoided, and it belongs to the Queen to present to the benefice avoided. This is clearly a prerogative of the Crown, whatever may have been the reason for it, and however it may have been acquired. It rests upon uniform usage, and is supported by so many dicta of our text writers and decisions of our Courts of justice, that it cannot now for a moment be questioned.—The prerogative is stated likewise to extend to the bishopric of Sodor and Man, not within the realm of England, although held under the Crown of England, that see having been immemorially a see of the Church of England, anciently attached to the province of Canterbury, and more recently to the province of York. Whether the prerogative likewise extends to the case of an English incumbent promoted to a bishopric in Ireland has been considered a question of great doubt. In "Mallory's Coare Impedit." 113, the learned author says that "de jure communi, all promotions are vacated by the taking of a bishopric as such, and that not only English promotions to bishoprics in England, but English promotions to bishoprics in Ireland, and vice versâ," the consequence no doubt being understood to be that the Crown would be entitled to present to the vacant benefice. So, in "Gibson's Codex," vol. i., lib. xxiii., cap. 2, it is said, "Upon promotion of any person to a bishopric in England or Ireland, the King had a right to present to such benefices or dignities as the person was possessed of before such promotion." On the other hand, Lord Coke (4 Inst. 356, 7), commenting upon the case in which the Bishop of Exeter was fined for his contempt in not admitting the King's presentee to an archdeaconry within his diocese, which the archdeacon had vacated on being promoted to be Archbishop of Dublin, says: "That when the archdeacon was by the King preferred to an archbishopric, he (the King) has the presentation to the archdeaconry in respect of the temporalities of the Bishop of Exeter, patron of the archdeaconry, and not by any prerogative. And so it is if an incumbent in Ireland be made bishop in England." The temporalities of the see of Exeter had their issue in the Crown, the see being vacant; and in the right thereof had the Crown the power to present to the archdeaconry [as if that had been a Bishop of Exeter, in whom the temporalities were vested, he, and not the King, would have been entitled to present to the archdeaconry on the archdeacon being promoted to the Archbishop of Dublin. Lord Coke considers England and Ireland, with a view to the "cession" of ecclesiastical preferment, on promotion to a bishopric, as different kingdoms and different churches, although under the same Crown. With reference to this Lord Chief Baron Comyn, in his "Digest, tit. 'Eaglise' (H. 6)," after stating that if an English archdeacon be created a bishop, the King shall present to the archdeaconry, and citing for this his authorities, adds, "Dubitatur, 3 Inst. 356, 7." This doubt seems much strengthened by the Irish statute, the 17th and 18th Car. II., c. 10, for preventing clergymen holding preferment in England from at the same time holding preferment in Ireland, and from the practice which seems to have followed thereon of clergymen always resigning it before they are promoted to be bishops in Ireland. But we do not think it necessary further to examine the authorities relating to this controverted question, or to give any opinion upon it; for were the rule clear and indisputed, that if the incumbent of a living in England is promoted to a bishopric in Ireland the Crown shall present to the English living, we think the consequence would by no means follow that the Queen has a right to present to the church of Stratfield-Mortimer on the Rev. Henry John Chitty Harper being appointed and consecrated Bishop of Christ Church, in the colony of New Zealand, although "the same be within the and part of the dominions of our said Lady the Queen." To establish this proposition we may expect either some express authority, or the explication of some principle which brings such a colonial bishopric into the category of English and Irish bishoprics for this purpose. Express authority there is none. The general dictum that if an incumbent is made a bishop the Crown shall present to his preferment thereby vacated, cannot be relied upon; for this evidently was meant to be understood of English preferment, and an English bishopric, and the same writers who lay this down say that the rule does not extend to a titular bishop or a suffragan bishop, under the statute the 21st of Henry VIII, cap. 14. See "Mallory, 113, Com. Dig., tit. 'Eaglise' (U. 1)." Nor has any principle been announced upon which the rule rests in respect of an English and Irish bishopric, and which would apply to this bishopric in New Zealand. The English and Irish bishops hold bishoprics founded and endowed by the Crown; they are prelates of a Church which is the Established Church of England and Ireland; they have by law well-defined jurisdiction and important rights and privileges, both spiritual and secular. The Bishop of Christ Church in New Zealand has nothing in common with them, except that he is a Protestant bishop canonically consecrated, and holding the faith of the Anglican Church. We do not question the power of the Queen to create a bishopric in any part of her dominions, except where, as in Scotland, such an exercise of prerogative is forbidden. In a newly settled colony such an exercise of prerogative is lawful, but we must bear in mind that in such a colony there is no established Church, and that the ministers of religion in communion with the Church of England, with the Church of Scotland, and with the church of Rome, in the absence of any imperial or colonial legislation on the subject are all upon an equal footing. If by legal enactment there were a fund created for the support of "the Protestant clergy in New Zealand," according to the opinion given by the judges in the House of Lords upon the Canada Reserves, the Episcopalian and Presbyterian clergy in the colony would be entitled to have it in equal proportions. It has likewise been held that the Crown may create an ecclesiastical Roman Catholic corporation in an English colony, as well as a Protestant bishopric.—The bishopric of Christ Church, in New Zealand, has been created purely by the prerogative of the Crown, without any such statute as 53 George III, cap. 155, or 3 and 4 William IV, cap. 85, which authorized the Crown to grant jurisdiction to bishops to be created in India, and to establish a hierarchy in that country, as had been before done in Jamaica and other parts of the dominions of the Crown in the West Indies. We by no means say that the promotion of an English incumbent to be a bishop in the East or West Indies would give the Crown a right to present to his English preferment; but there is a great difficulty in saying that the Bishop of Christ Church, in New Zealand, has any jurisdiction except over those who voluntarily submit to his jurisdiction; and he really seems in this respect to be in the situation of the "titular bishop," whose promotion to be a bishop all the authorities agree gives the Crown no right to present to his preferment. Had the declaration been sufficient in showing a prima facie right in the Crown to present to this living on the promotion of the incumbent to a bishopric, we should have had no difficulty in deciding that the plea is bad, for, although the advowson was granted by the Crown to Eton College, and the grant was confirmed by Parliament, the claim to present on such a vacancy would be incident of the right granted, and not a derogation of the grant. But being of opinion that the declaration shows no title in the Crown, and that the right to present to the living was the same as if the vacancy had arisen upon the death of the incumbent, it is our duty to give judgment for the defendants.

* * * * Having thus carefully analyzed the dates we were in a position to measure the exact loss of time incurred by the employment of sailing instead of steam vessels. That loss, upon an average of some fifty vessels may, as we have seen, be as nearly as possible estimated at thirty days. Now, what is to be said in answer to this case? Is it to be pretended that, within a month after the arrival of news from Meerut on June 27th, the Government could not have taken up steam vessels enough to embark 5,000 men before the end of July? We should be very glad to refer this enquiry to the Committee at Lloyd's, or to any half-dozen brokers in London, Liverpool or the Clyde. If ministers had done this, it is proved to demonstration that, by the second week in October, Sir Colin Campbell would have had a force at his disposal with which he might have moved up to relieve Lucknow. The corpus delicti is, therefore, clearly established, and the blame attached to the parties really responsible for it will be in no degree lessened by the fortunate accident which may save our empire in spite of our own carelessness and neglect. We fervently trust that Lucknow may be rescued by the Indian Government by its own unaided resources; but that consummation will detract not a whit from the heavy responsibility of those by whose lethargy and folly the arrival of effective aid was delayed. If Delhi had fallen a fortnight later, and if Campbell's outposts had not gained early hence the necessity of his adopting the only alternative open to him of indicting the defendant for perjury. At the conclusion of the counsel's speech, he proceeded to call witnesses, and the case was adjourned. On Tuesday the case was resumed, and after lasting the whole day was again adjourned. The case was concluded on Wednesday, but the jury after a long absence could not agree. Lord Campbell said that under these circumstances he should, of his own authority, discharge the jury. His lordship added that the case would be tried by another jury, who, he hoped, would be unanimous.—Liverpool Times.

Toronto City Council.

COMMUNICATIONS.

A communication was received from the city Clerk of Milwaukie, accompanied with a copy of their charter and ordinances of that city, and thanks to the Toronto Corporation for its present of a view of this city. Also a communication from the city Clerk of Boston, accompanied with a fine view of Boston. Also another communication upon the same subject from the city Clerk of Kingston. And one from the city of Rochester, on the same subject.

A vote of thanks was presented to the Corporations of Milwaukee and Boston, both on motion of Ald. Phillpotts.

Ald. Worthington presented the final report of the Board of Works, a very voluminous document, recommending that it should be printed. The following statistics were given:

Total length of streets opened, 96 miles.
Plank side walks, 6 ft. and under 42, }
" " 6 ft. and over 32, }
Total of side walks 74 miles.
Macadamized streets, 22 miles; crossings, number 860; culverts, number 730.

The Council, on motion of Alderman O'Donohoe, then went into committee of the whole on the report of the committee of Wharves and Harbours. Alderman Manning in the chair. They recommended that five acres of land should be leased to Mr. Moodie, and the committee rose, reported progress, and adopted the report.

On motion of Alderman Manning, 50 copies of the report of the Chief of Police were ordered to be printed.—Carried.

Committee of the Whole, Alderman Harrington in the chair, for the consideration of a bill to provide for the licensing of hotels and places of entertainment.

The 9th clause of the bill proposed that licenses granted under the authority of this act shall be charged as follows:—

For refreshment rooms where wines or liquors are sold	£25	0	0
For a confectioners shop	20	0	0
For a hotel with over 20 beds	15	0	0
For a tavern with grocery connected	12	10	0
For a tavern having five beds and under twenty	10	0	0
For a Lager Bier saloon where spirits are not sold	12	10	0
For an eating house keeping a public table, furnishing ale, &c., but not wines or liquors	3	10	0
For every billiard table where not more than one is kept	10	0	0
For every second table	7	10	0
For every third table	5	0	0
For every other table	2	10	0
For every ten pin alley where not more than two are in the same house	5	0	0
For every other alley	2	10	0
For every bagatelle board	2	10	0
For every Mississippi board	2	10	0

The third clause proposed that the Recorder, the Police Magistrate, and the Inspector of Licence should be a Board of Inspectors.

Ald. Manning moved that the words "the Mayor" be inserted instead of "the inspector of Licences." He did this in deference to the opinion of some members of the committee; for his own part he preferred the clause remaining as it was.

Several objections were urged against this clause, among others, Councillor Moodie contended, that neither the Recorder nor the Police Magistrate could be expected to trot round the city to inspect public-houses, and the General Inspector of Licenses had as much to do now as he could conscientiously attend to in the city.

Ald. Duggan thought that the Board of Inspectors ought to be composed of men who were independent both of the public and the Corporation.

Ald. Worthington concurred in this view, and said he had consulted the Recorder and Police Magistrate, who had consented to undertake the duty.

Ald. Brunel was pleased to hear that they would accept the office. He would support the removal of those who granted licenses, so far as possible from those to whom they were granted.

Ald. Thompson said he thought it most objectionable to make the Mayor an Inspector of Licences so long as he was elected by the people. He hoped the clause would be allowed to remain as it at present stood.

Councillor Fox thought that the Mayor ought to be a member of the Board; if he could not be trusted, neither could the Recorder nor the Police Magistrate.

The clause was then put and carried, the Mayor being thus excluded from the Board.

The 6th clause of the bill proposed that detectives should be employed, and the Chamberlain be authorized to pay their expenses.

Ald. Manning thought it would be better for the money to be paid, only after having received the consent of the Police and Prisons Committee.

Ald. Brunel objected to any money being paid without the consent of the Council; he moved that the following words be inserted, "that all expenses connected therewith shall be reported to this Council by the Committee of Police and Prisons, at least once a month." Carried.

Ald. Brunel moved that the first, second, and fifth items of charges be struck out, and the words inserted "for refreshment saloons, grocers' and Confectioner's shops, where wines and spirituous liquors are sold, but where no more than four bed rooms for travellers are kept, £25."

Ald. O'Donohoe was in favour of charging such places £50 for a license per year, as it would increase the number of respectable hotels, and check common saloons.

Alderman Brunel said that he agreed with the principle, but thought Ald. O'Donohoe carried it too far—such a proceeding would cause great, and most likely successful efforts to be made, in order to evade taking out a license.

Councillor Ramsay spoke against Ald. Brunel's amendment. He thought it was very hard upon the poor tavern-keepers.—It was iniquitous in the extreme; and before he would allow such an iniquitous job to pass, he would speak until 12 o'clock.

Alderman Brunel, replying to Mr. Ramsay, that gentleman rose and left. By so doing, he broke up the quorum, and the Council adjourned.

A REMARKABLE SURGICAL OPERATION.—The Charleston Courier records a remarkable operation in surgery, performed in that city on the 12th ultimo. The case was one of "Elephantiasis," and extended from the parieties of the abdomen to the ground, weighing some ninety eight pounds. It had been increasing in size eight years, but has remained stationary for the last year and a half. From the immense size of the tumor, nature was inadequate to supply it with a sufficient quantity of blood for its nourishment, so that mortification took place at its lowest extremity, and threatened the life of the patient; hence the only means to be adopted for saving the life of the patient was its speedy removal. This was done at the amphitheatre of the South Carolina Medical College, which was crowded by a large number of professional as well as non-professional gentlemen. The negro man was put under the influence of chloroform, and was totally insensible to all pain. The tumor was successfully removed by Dr. Myddleton Michael in one hour. When the patient recovered from the sleep which that magnum bonum dei, chloroform produced, he was not aware that the operation had been performed, so perfectly was the insensibility produced by its inhalation.

The Leviathan.

This gigantic ship would undoubtedly add to the military strength of Great Britain, if she belonged to Government, as if kept ready equipped at Holyhead an army of 10,000 men could be speedily despatched to any threatening point of the West Indies or Mediterranean; but she is destined for commercial purposes, and is, according to report, to run between Holyhead and Portland, to compete for the carrying of the thousands of emigrants and the freight seeking the Western States. Well-informed passenger brokers are sanguine of her success, which entirely depends on her filling, and this, they assert, cheap rates will ensure—steamers depending on first-class passengers do not pay. This has been demonstrated as far as the New York steamers are concerned; on Wednesday, for instance the Adriatic sailed from Liverpool with only 22 cabin passengers and 130 tons of goods the cheaper passage money to Boston and Portland commanding, it would seem, the public support. The government subsidy helps the owners. The Peninsular and Oriental Company have not only a subsidy, but a monopoly of first-class passengers and goods; but to America we have almost a daily steamer to and from Europe; and then comes the question can the Leviathan, with the capacity of seven of the average size steamers, be navigated at the same cost as three, and earn the receipts of five, taking passengers at second and third class rates? If she can, there will be a complete revolution in the carrying trade to America and Canada by the employment of vessels from six to ten thousand tons adapted to the trade; such vessels, running in summer to Quebec from Liverpool, would monopolize immigrant traffic, the only lucrative one, and obtain the goods also. It must, nevertheless, be admitted that it is a great experiment, and equally so that if successful, the transit trade must be diverted to ports having sufficient depth of water. At New York a vessel was neaped in her dock for three days. To be subjected to such a delay with mail steamers would be too serious a drawback to commend a preference over deep-water ports like Portland and Quebec, the latter port being connected by rail and water with the Far West.—Harrapath's Journal.

We read in a United States paper that a Watch Factory has just been established at Waltham, Massachusetts, by Appleton, Tracy & Co., where the separate parts are all accurately stamped out by machinery and fitted by hand, and the corresponding parts fitted to them by females. All the watches are made alike so that they can be easily repaired, and any part of one else will exactly fit any other watch of the same size, so that they can easily be repaired and refitted.—The simplest kind of lever watch without the cases, in the form adopted, and they can turn out about ten thousand per annum.

☞ Desertions from the U. S. army are becoming very frequent. Three weeks ago no less than 23 were court-martialed at the Newport barracks for that offence and drunkenness, and, were sentenced to flogging—fifty lashes on the bare back—branded with the letter D in Indian ink on the left thigh, and, lastly, to be drummed out of service. The 23 troops were transported to headquarters, and 11 were punished to the punishment, but 12 are to suffer the remainder.

Our Social Derangement.

The great difficulty the mercantile class has had to contend against in the settlement of their accounts, does not give way in anything like the degree it would, if those who have it in their power to put money in circulation would avail themselves of their opportunity. To the producer from the soil, all the links in the long chain of dependencies address themselves, in the anxious expectation that they will be moved to bring their commodities to market, and set free the money they receive, in the payment of those who supplied them with goods, implements, and conveniences, upon the strength of understanding that they in their turn should be able to make it right at the new year, with those who have entrusted them with their property. It is no argument, so long as a man is in debt, that the market does not suit him, if it were, debts never would be paid; but if such as have bought on credit, would look to the honour they have staked, they would admit at once the justice of the demand which is made upon them to redeem their pledges, and prove themselves honest men. This year is unlike any former one; merchants, mechanics, and others, who live by enabling the farmer to work the soil, have no recourse but to their debtors; the Banks and all other avenues of accommodation are closed to them. In such a position it is not honest for the farmer to retain from them that relief he owes them, unless he has some better reason than is afforded by the lowness of the markets. The state of the produce and the labour markets depend on the state of the money market: and when the letter is closed, the former cannot be very active. Let every one receive and bear his own share of the common trouble, and it the return for last year's labour does not repay the laborer, that is as nothing compared to the open injury he inflicts on those who confided in him, when he does not exert himself to redeem them; and besides all this, the misery incident on the servile condition of a debtor, immeasurably outweighs any supposed pleasure in expectancy of profit on other mens' means. True happiness proceeds only from virtuous enjoyment, all else is a snare and a deceit. How much better is it to own what we possess, than to possess what we do not own!

The New School Board.

At the Election for School Trustees in Peterboro, out of the four to be chosen, only one of the old ones was returned. The parties whose service expired were Messrs. Cluxton, Haslehurst, White and Rutherford; and the parties returned were Messrs. Cluxton, Sawers, Arnott, and Macdonald. Great complaints have been made about the management of the School business latterly, and in this spirit the change of trustees was made by the ratepayers. There will now be enough of new material in the Board to destroy the combination that had grown up, and was so effectually estranging the sympathies of the people from the public school room. There is no reason why the people should not know what is being done with the money collected for school purposes, but on the contrary they ought to enquire, if the information is not volunteered to them. The Peterborough Review laments over the defeat of Mr. Thomas White, Jr., and thinks that his constituents were very dull upon his merits during his two years service. He is afraid too that the "quiet gentlemanly meetings" of the Board will assume a different aspect because Mr. Arnott will sit there in his stead. There is no reason, that we have ever heard, why, if Mr. Arnott was more respected than Mr. White he should not be equally acceptable to the Board, since it is presumed that the Trustees were made for the Board not the Board for the Trustees. In regard to the quietness of the proceedings, Mr. White and his friends may depend that it will only be broken where the public interests are opposed to the conduct of the Board, and if there had not been so much "quietness" inside the walls hitherto, there would now be less "unquietness" outside Whatever may be the wishes of the Board, the public will now be let more into its secrets, than Mr. White was willing to indulge them; and if Mr. White wants the truth told him, our mind is that he and Mr. F. Ferguson, the Secretary, were scratching backs, and each making a nice thing out of the public trust. But their game is played.

Good Templars Celebration!

This respectable order of the Temperance body have advertised a Soiree to come off this evening, at the Wesleyan Methodist School Room, in celebration of their first year's growth. This Institution has claims, on account of its social value, upon the public for encouragement and sympathy; and it is to be hoped that the entertainment they have provided will be cheerfully patronized in by all who desire to promote sobriety and good-fellowship in their neighbourhood. Addresses will be delivered on the occasion, and, no doubt, impressions will be made which will confer enduring pleasure on those who partake.

The Town Council.

The election by the Council of their officers took place yesterday. Mr. James Stevenson was re-elected Mayor, without opposition; Mr. W. A. Scott, Reeve; Mr. Daniel Hopkins, Deputy Reeve; and Messrs. W. Coulter, and W. B. Read, auditors. A committee was then struck, to appoint standing Committees, and report on Monday evening, to which time the Council was then adjourned.

The Jeufosse Murder Trial.

(From the London Times.)

The trial of Madame de Jeufosse, of her two sons and of her gamekeeper, Crespel, which has just been brought to a conclusion at Evreux, is worthy of brief notice, not only from the romantic incidents of the case, but as representing a striking contrast with our English system of criminal procedure. All the prisoners have been acquitted, upon what grounds it would be difficult to say, except that the murdered man was a sort of disreputable character, and that he had persisted in annoying the Jeufosse family. The facts of the case are so completely out of the ordinary course of crimes which we are in the habit of seeing tried before our criminal courts that the report of it reads more like a chapter from Gerfaut, or any other melodramatic romance, than of a grave proceeding in which the lives of four human beings were at stake. If we would justly appreciate the principles which led the French Jury to a verdict of acquittal, we must discard all our vulgar and commonplace notions derived from such books as Archibold's Criminal Practice and Roscoe's Criminal Evidence, and be content to take our law from the repertoire of the Porte St. Martin or of the Adelphi at their seasons of grammar melodrama. A retired provincial family have notice that a dissolute squire in the neighborhood is in the habit of clambing over their park wall for the purpose of paying court to the daughter of the house.—Hereupon the mother desires her gamekeeper to take his gun and pick the fellow off. The gamekeeper follows her instructions to the letter, and shoots the intruder down. Where he fell, there he lay for an hour or two and there he died. "How say you, gentlemen of the jury, Guilty, or not Guilty?" "Not Guilty" was the well-nigh instantaneous reply. In prosaic England we should have held that the proper course for the head of a family to pursue under such circumstances would have been to give notice to the police, who would have carried off the interloping Lothario to gaol, where he would have been dealt with according to his deserts, and have been effectually restrained from annoying the family for the future. A sound beating or a ducking in the horsepond might, perhaps, have been esteemed a pardonable retaliation under the circumstances of the case. There can, however, be no doubt that the lady and the gamekeeper who in cold blood and with every circumstance of deliberation planned and carried out the murder of this intruder—blackguard as he was—would in England have been consigned to the gallows as the penalty of their crime. They manage matters differently on the other side of the Channel. Whether they or we are in the right it is not for us to say; but at least the decision would appear to establish this principle, that in France private persons are justified in exacting revenge for any injury they may have received. A French jury will simply consider whether the measure of provocation was sufficient to justify the measure of revenge.

The facts of the case are very simple.—Madame de Jeufosse is the widow of a cavalry officer, dwelling in her own chateau at the village of St. Aubin-sur-Gaillon; she had two sons and a daughter, Blanche, a young lady, now about nineteen years of age. With the family resided a governess named Laurence Thouzery, about one year older than Mademoiselle de Jeufosse, whose welfare should have been, equally with that of her own daughter, an object of the most anxious solicitude to this very aristocratic lady. Now, in the immediate neighborhood lived a disreputable kind of French "squireen" named Guillot—a married man—between whom and the Jeufosse family a close intimacy arose. Madame de Jeufosse soon received notice from some good-natured friends, that M. Guillot amused his leisure by making love to Mademoiselle Thouzery; but what of that? The girl was a governess, or humble companion, who was but following her natural destiny—it was not worth while making a rupture for si peu de chose. When Guillot, the inconstant, however, began to cast higher, even to that lofty region in which Mademoiselle Blanche was enshrined, the complexion of affairs was altered, and a little bloodshed became necessary to appease the indignation of the bygone Jeufosses and of their stern representative, the heroine of the present romance. It certainly does appear that for a lady who was so very sensitive on the point of honour, Madame de Jeufosse neglected the most ordinary measures of precaution. She knew the character of this man Guillot, she knew that his various amours were the talk of the country-side, and that he had actually endeavoured to seduce a young lady under her own roof, and yet she permitted him to have free access to her daughter, to sit with her for hours at the piano, and so forth. This daughter was a young French girl, and when we use this expression we mean nothing more than that, from the system of female education which our neighbours have adopted, a young French girl 19 years old stands in a very different position so far as self-defence is concerned, from her English sister of the same age. The natural consequence of this negligence followed—a connection more or less intimate arose between Mademoiselle Blanch, and M. Guillot. To what extent this was carried it is not for us to determine, and, indeed, it would be difficult to arrive at any settled conclusion on the matter from the shpslop evidence adduced, consisting principally of the boasting and bragging of Guillot himself. There was, however, enough, and more than enough, to justify the pointings of a mother, and to kindle feelings of a yet more violent kind in the breasts of the young lady's brothers. Had either of these two young gentlemen thrashed M. Guillot—had they called him out and shot him in the open field, divines and lawyers must necessarily have disapproved such a course, but the judgment of the world could scarcely have been one of unqualified condemnation. They did nothing of the kind, but left the chief part in the drama to their mother—a lady who seems to have been cast in the Medea or Lady Macbeth mould. She called for her gamekeeper, Crespel; she adjured him to defend the honor of the Jeufosse family even by slaying. "You do not watch well enough!" said the lady of Jeufosse. "You do not remember the promise you made to my husband. You do not support the honor of his name and that of my children. You must put an end to the conduct of these vipers at my cost!"—After this "sublime Alexandrine" Madame de Jeufosse is said to have added, "Fool, nothing! The Emperor Imperial and the examining magistrate have both told me that we can fire on those who act as the man does, and that even if death ensue we shall not be disquieted." Crespel, who is a man of a practical turn of mind, hereupon carefully loaded his double-barrelled gun and proceeded to act on counsel's opinion.

Now, we are far from saying that the provocation given by this wretched fellow, Guillot, did not justify any reasonable measure of retaliation. The limits of revenge however, must be fixed somewhere, and it has been generally understood that deliberate assassination is somewhat too rigorous a policy, no matter what the provocation may have been. On the 12th of June, however, about 10.30 p.m. Emile Guillot, accompanied by his servant, Gros, arrived at the enclosure of the park of Jeufosse. He entered the park alone, and approached a tree. At the bottom of this tree were two bricks, and between these bricks Guillot placed a letter, and was then making the best of his way to a clump of shrubs 26 yards distant. Before he reached the covert, Crepel, who had been watching his proceedings from behind a fir-tree, started from his ambush, and calling out, "Halt, you are dead!" took deliberate aim, and gave Guillot the contents of the barrel. Although what had passed was well known in the chateau from the report of Crepel himself, who proceeded to inform his mistress of what he had done, and from the alarm which Gros, the servant raised, when he ascertained his master's condition, Madame de Jeufosse and her people let the poor wretch lie where he had fallen, and where he expired about half an hour after he had received his death wound. Such was the act which Mr. Berryer, the counsel for the prisoners, attempted to justify, and in the attempt he succeeded to the satisfaction of a French Jury. The two principal arguments employed were as follows: It was said that by a particular article in the French Code a person who trespasses on an enclosure at night does so on his own peril, and if he be slain in the course of his trespass, so much the worse for him; but it is not murder. Whether this be French law or not, we will not pretend to say, but we feel very sure of the opinion which our English Crown lawyers would entertain upon such a doctrine. Again, Mr. Berryer, urged that, according to the law, any husband who detected his wife in criminal intercourse with her paramour might slay them both on the spot. The law would have regard to the natural play of human passion upon such enormous provocation; but can it be said that the honour of her daughter is less dear to a mother than the honour of his wife—than his own honour—to a husband?" This being so, and according to Mr. Berryer's way of putting it, it was almost a a fortiori case, Madame de Jeufosse was fully justified in planning and carrying out the assassination of Guillot in retaliation for his offence. We should have doubted if this were law anywhere out of Corsica; but it seems that universal France is prepared to adopt the practice upon such points of the most vindictive of her departments, if we may judge from the recent verdict of the Evreux Jury. Among us—but, then, we are cold, prosaic Englishmen, negligent of the point of honor—the provocation supposed by Mr. Berryer would, no doubt, excuse the husband who, in the madness of the moment, struck the guilty pair where he found them; but woe to him if he but went down stairs, deliberately loaded a revolver, and returned to execute vengeance in his own way! But here was a case in which the plan was laid days and weeks beforehand—the gamekeeper waited for his victim, as a sportsman waits in the dark of the evening for a wild duck—and slew him in cold blood. It is quite clear that the French and the English methods of procedure are totally different upon such points.

Successes in India.

From the London Times, Dec. 24.

Best among the good news which has of late arrived from India is that which we publish to-day. Lucknow was relieved about the 20th of November, and the women and children and wounded safely sent back to Cawnpore. The series of operations which has ended with this happy result will be easily understood by those who have followed the narrative of events as transmitted by former mails. It will be remembered that Sir Colin Campbell left Cawnpore on the 8th, with a force which has been variously estimated at from 1,000 to nearly 5,000 men. In the meantime the column under Colonel Grant had reached the Alumbagh. This force was also differently calculated by different authorities; but if the estimate of the whole strength at present under the Commander-in-Chief be anything like correct, the whole column must have been swelled by some additional force until it numbered far more than the 1,800 which was at first assigned to it.—Sir Colin Campbell joined the force at the Alumbagh on the 11th, and two days afterwards active operations began. From the despatch of General Havelock, detailing the events of his entrance in September, we may form some notion of the difficulties which the British Commander had to encounter nearly two months after, when the enemy had been enlightened on our tactics, had discovered the weak points of their own position, and had had time to throw up works at every place against which an attack might be directed. It seems fortunate that the Alumbagh was occupied by us, or else the river, some miles to the south of the town, might have been once more guarded, the bridge broken down, and our troops subjected to much loss while crossing under heavy fire. But, as it is, we have no doubt that the line of the canal was defended, the road broken up, and the part of the town near the King's Palace, where Havelock forced an entrance, put into a better condition for resisting an enemy. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that for six days there was, according to the telegram, a series of severe and bloody struggles with the enemy. Doubtless, too, the mutineers had improved their method of street fighting, and that much of our loss took place while the troops were making their way through the straggling town, which though not solid enough to resist the fire of artillery, might well shelter hordes of sepoys, who would shoot down our soldiers at every turn. Another despatch states, that Lucknow was relieved with a loss of only four officers and 40 men,—a piece of news which we can hardly reconcile with the account of a "series of severe and bloody struggles" extending over six days. However, it is of little use to speculate as to matters which we shall learn in full detail in the course of a few days. By this last the principal posts of the Sepoys will have been captured, and we may presume that they were finally driven from the capital of Oude into the open country, there to be followed up en masse as possible by our energetic Commander-in-Chief. The despatch says that on the 20th the sick and wounded, with the General Outram's wound, of which so much was said, had not proved serious.

We cannot but congratulate the country once more on the deliverance of the heroic band, which had since the end of May been immured in the midst of a hostile city, and exposed to the attacks of the whole power of the mutineers. Never in recent times has there been a defence more astonishing than that of Lucknow, if we consider the small number of the garrison, the surprise of the sudden outbreak, the great proportion of helpless women and children, the weakness of the fortifications, which were merely such as could be adapted to the defence of a simple dwelling house, and the difficulty of procuring provisions in a country which was swept by the armed bands of the enemy. When the narrative of this siege shall be given to the world, it will, we think, be found that among the many exploits which have made the name of England famous throughout the East, nothing has surpassed the stern courage and chivalrous devotion which have rescued so many families from a butchery as terrible as that of Cawnpore. If the Asiatic be not differently formed from the European, we may expect that the memory of the five months' defence of Lucknow will, perhaps more than any event of the year, force him to the conviction that it is not given to his race to overthrow the Power to which Providence has, after so long a struggle, confirmed the dominion of the East.

The Government telegram states the army under the Commander-in-Chief to amount to about 22,000 men. It is evident, however, that in this estimate there is some inaccuracy. It is either an error of the telegraph for 12,000, or it must include the whole body of troops which are on their way up the country. Even 12,000 would seem a large body, considering the difficulty of transport, and the fact that the highest estimate on the arrival of the last mail was only 10,000 or 11,000, including the liberated garrison of Lucknow, and that in six days' fighting this force must have seriously diminished. However, as it is expressly stated that large masses of European troops were reaching India weekly, we may, without being over sanguine, believe that upwards of 20,000 men are at least on their way to Lucknow. The lack of steamers on the Ganges, and the necessity of sending every man by a bullock-cart must, of course, make the process of transport long and wearisome; but, as we may presume that in six months the Government has time to organize a fair system of communication, it is likely that reinforcements would reach Sir C. Campbell in time for him to give a good account of the Oude rebels before the end of the year.

At least, the country is delivered from all anxiety on the subject. The Indian Mutiny is now at an end. On all sides we hear of nothing but the defeat and dispersion of the rebels. Nusseerabad, in the isolated British district of Ajmeer, has been relieved by Brigadier Stewart, in command of the Malwa field force, the enemy from the southern districts about Neemuch and Mundesore have been dispersed, and Malwa is being cleared of insurgents. Thus, we hope that the whole Mahratta country will at once be reduced to tranquility. The Gwalior Contingent has been already beaten and, though a part has penetrated to Oude a large number of the men have probably dispersed to their homes. The insurrection was at the date of the last mail active only in Rohilcund and Oude, and we have now the gratifying intelligence that the flying columns under Brigadier Showers, Colonel Cotton, and Colonel Tiddel are securing Rohilcund, complete success attending their operations every where.

It is almost certain, then, that at the present moment the insurrection, if it still exists at all, is confined entirely to the lately annexed province of Oude, a country which, though thickly inhabited, is of limited extent and wholly surrounded by our own armies and those of the Prince of Nepaul, who has shown himself our steady ally. Jung Bahadoor has already done good service during the war, and there is little doubt that if the Sepoys retreat northward they will be attacked and cut to pieces by the forces under his command. Such, then, is the position of the Indian Mutiny within six months of the day that it first broke out and carried terror through the country. On every point the rebels have been met, defeated and dispersed. The Lower Provinces, on the one side, are perfectly tranquil. On the other, the Punjab, Delhi, Agra, and Rohilcund are firmly subjected to our authority. To the south the turbulent districts of Central India are settling down under the British Residents and the Mahratta Rajahs, whose fidelity has been so exemplary; and on the North the Nepaulese Prince is preparing to crush every band which may make its way to his frontier. The whole treacherous Sepoy army is as it were in a trap, and must in a few weeks be cut to pieces or submit to our mercy. The towns and petty villages will give but little shelter to the ruffians who could not hold Delhi and Agra, Cawnpore and Lucknow. The task of Sir Colin Campbell is now comparatively easy. With a sufficient force he may march from one end of Oude to the other in a month, scattering the mutineers wherever they may make a stand. In fact, the large army which has by this time arrived in India will hardly find an enemy to contend with, and the 5,000 men which the Chinese Expedition lent us may be soon returned with interest.

So ends the great Indian Mutiny of 1857—the terrible outbreak which was to shatter the power of Britain and send her begging for foreign assistance at the price of Gibraltar and Corfu. The lesson will hardly be forgotten by ourselves or by the nations around us.

Our Modern Eloquence.

We had occasion lately to observe on the marked poverty and inadequacy of our modern verse-writers in treating the noble themes which the events of the last few years have supplied in abundance. Feebleness of thought and meanness of style seem, however, still more lamentably conspicuous in our contemporary orators than in our modern poets. The most recent and most signal example which presents itself of this is the Queen's Speech delivered at the opening of the present session. If this document could in any sense be understood as the language of the Sovereign, we should consider it wholly beyond the scope of our criticism. The chivalrous feeling of respect which belongs to English loyalty would revolt at the notion of analysing and dissecting the gracious address of the Queen. But it is so well understood that the Speech from the Throne to the two Houses of Parliament is entirely the composition of the Minister, and that her Majesty has as much personal concern with it as with a writ issuing out of the Queen's Bench in the name of "Victoria, by the grace of God," that we feel no scruple about treating it like any other State paper. Queen Elizabeth addressed her troops at Tilbury in her own language, and we doubt not that the speech was a far better one than could have been put into her mouth by Burleigh and Cecil. We are equally certain that if her Majesty Queen Victoria had delivered her own sentiments to Parliament at the present crisis, it would have been in a language and a spirit far more suited to the dignity of the place and the occasion than that of the document which was handed to her Majesty, on his knees, by the Lord Chancellor. The offence of clipping the Queen's coin is a high misdemeanor; and not less, we should suppose, is that of clipping the Queen's English. Certainly never was there an occasion when it was more fitting that high and noble words should be placed in the mouth of an English Queen, coming in state to address her Parliament on the perils and achievements of her gallant armies in India. Every one knows how Cobbett illustrated every possible error in grammar by passages extracted from King's Speeches. But certainly, for a complete repertory of bad style, we never met with so compendious an example as the last speech from the Throne. While men's hearts are throbbing and their blood tingling at the recital of the noble feats of arms in Hindostan, this is the language which the Minister does not think it unworthy to put into the mouth of his Sovereign:—

"While I deeply deplore the suffering to which many of my subjects in India have been exposed, and while I grieve for the extensive bereavements and sorrow which it has caused, I have derived the greatest satisfaction from the distinguished success which have attended the heroic exertions of the comparatively small forces which have been opposed to greatly superior numbers, without the aid of the powerful reinforcements despatched from this country to their assistance."

Heavens! what a sentence—

Where feeble expletives their aid do join,
And ten low words do creep in one dull line.

Here is another elegant extract:—

"I have observed with equal gratification, that many civilians placed in extreme difficulty and danger, have displayed the highest qualities, including in some instances those that would do honour to veteran soldiers."

What a neat copulative we have in the word "including," and what a cautious qualification is wrapped up in the "some instances!" We should think this panegyric must have been settled by a special pleader. The language of a Sovereign should be simple, concise, and grand: but this is mean, involved and flabby. Was a great theme ever so lowered by such bald and inadequate treatment? We say nothing of the introduction of such words as "civilians" or "bereavement" into a dignified composition—words for which no authority will be found, in this sense, in Johnson, but mark the feebleness of the thought, the poorness of the language, the inelegance of the composition, and the clumsiness of the sentences. Surely it is a species of treason to cause the Queen of England to deliver a discourse which would not be creditable to a provincial mayor.

Even if his position did not make him responsible for his performance, Lord Palmerston's own handling of the topics in the House of Commons would have betrayed the authorship of the Royal Speech. So meagre, slovenly, and unworthy a commemoration of great deeds and great men, was never heard from the mouth of an English Minister in the English Parliament, as Lord Palmerston's speech in moving the vote of a pension to General Havelock. This is a specimen of our modern Ministerial oratory:—

"The list of those who have gained distinction in this unfortunate and calamitous war is a numerous one:—Wilson, Havelock, Eyre, Saltkeld, Home, the last two of whom we can only deeply regret, for as they lived so they nobly died in the service of their country:—Nicholson and Ntill, two officers that the country must deeply deplore. Then, again, we have Gen. Wheeler, who also, placed in a position of the utmost difficulty and danger, nobly did his duty, but lost his life in the service; Chamberlain, Cotton—in fact, there is hardly a single officer who has not been called on in the course of these events to perform his duty, who has not acted in a manner to entitle his services to be enrolled in the annals of military fame."

And so the Premier went on for ten minutes more of stammering, rambling, shambling drivelling common place, which reads for all the world like the funeral composition of a village stonemason. Truly, heroes have a right to complain that, living in the nineteenth century, they are no better off for a votes' saver than the brave men who lived before Agamemnon.

Unfortunately, things are not a bit mended when we escape from the atmosphere of mediocrity which broods over the Treasury Bench. The leader of the Opposition, with a still greater alacrity in sinking, descends even below the dead level of commonplace into the very abysses of bad taste. It once before happened to Mr. Disraeli to have to deliver, in an official capacity, the panegyric of a great warrior. On the occasion of the death of the Duke of Wellington, Mr. Disraeli pronounced an oration which was sufficiently singular to make people begin to doubt whether they ought not to admire it. But before the question could be settled, it was discovered it was not his own, and that he had stolen some dead leaves from a chaplet woven by M. Theirs, for the grave of a French Marshall, to lay on the fresh grave of the great Duke. The incident at the time caused much amusement, and not a little scorn. We are glad to perceive that Mr. Disraeli has learnt by experience the folly and the danger of plagiarism, for the lesson which he received was a severe one. His recent effort bears internal proof of genuineness. But we confess we think he was right to borrow, if he could only have been sure of escaping detection, for the old smuggled article was of a very superior quality to the new home manufacture. We have seen with what elegant simplicity the Premeir marshals his heroes. The treatment of the leader of the Opposition was of a more elaborate, studied, and pretentious nature. Here is a sample:—

"Some may receive our sympathies. Some unfortunately are gone. But when we remember the name of Wilson—when we remember the name of Havelock and others who may distinguish themselves, let us never forget the intrepid Nicholson, let us drop a tear over the fiery Neill."

We will venture to say that, from the days of Sir Richard Blackmore to the present time, a more egregious instance of bombastic and inflated fudge ta te than this apostrophe to General Neill does not stand recorded. No man of taste who heard it but must have shuddered—no man who reads it can repress a smile. Mr. Disraeli ventures to remind us of Mr. Canning's fine saying, that India was "a land fertile in heroes"—as if he thought that he had succeeded to the mantle of Canning. But the motion of the House of Commons dropping a tear on the fiery Neill would have supplied Canning with matter of mirth for a year. Conceive a man who professes, like Mr. Disraeli, to have practised literature and studied oratory, deliberately adorning a topic of the deepest pathos with an image irresistibly suggestive of the most ludicrous ideas. We hardly venture to realise the physical results of the process which Mr. Disraeli suggests. Fancy the 656 M. P's dropping a tear (necessarily a large one) on a fiery body. The sound produced by the operation would be inevitably the very reverse of the applause which Mr. Disraeli wishes to convey. Thus, by the debasing influence of false taste and a tinsel style, may the saddest things be made most comical, and the mind, instead of being animated and elevated by a just and lofty image, be lowered shocked by a grotesque and incongruous metaphor. Yet such, alas! with few exceptions, is the style of our modern eloquence.

These severe, but in some respects just remarks, are extracted from a late London paper. They are followed by an enormous puff of Lord Derby, which we omit.

BURNING OF THE "SARAH SANDS."

A letter from captain Castle, commander of the "Sarah Sands," is published, describing the partial destruction of the ship, and the escape of the troops and crew. The fire was discovered at 3.45 p.m.;—about 9 p. m. a fearful explosion took place in the port magazine. "By this time," says Capt. Castle, "the ship was one body of flames from the stern to the main rigging, and thinking it scarcely possible to save her, I called Major Brett, in command of the troops forward, and told him my opinion, requesting him to endeavour to keep order among the troops till the last. But at the same time to use every exertion to check the fire. No person can describe the manner in which the men worked to keep the fire back. One party were below keeping the bulkheads cool, several of whom were dragged up senseless, and fresh volunteers took their places, but were soon in the same state. At 11 p.m. the main topsail yard took fire. Mr. Welsh, Quartermaster, and four or five soldiers went aloft with wet blankets and succeeded in extinguishing it, but not until the yard and mast were nearly burnt through. About midnight we appeared to have made some impression on the fire, and after that drove it back inch by inch until daylight, when it was completely got under. The ship now appeared to be in a fearful plight, merely the shell remaining. The port quarter blown out by the explosion; 15 feet of water in the hold, and the ship rolling heavily, and taking in large quantities of water aft."

The Mechanical Bakery in Philadelphia.

A vast baking establishment has been constructed in Philadelphia, using the mechanical ovens and other machinery of Mr. H. Berden of New York. It was inaugurated on Thursday, in the presence of a large number of prominent gentlemen. The works were in complete operation, and the processes were exhibited and explained.

The following description of the establishment is taken from The Ledger:

"The building in which the baking process is carried on occupies a lot 51 feet on Broad street, by 190 feet on Vine street. The main building is five stories high, including the basement, and is nearly fireproof. A railway is laid from the centre track of the Reading Railroad, in Broad street, into and along the southerly side of the first floor, until it meets the hoisting apparatus, thus affording the facility of receiving the flour directly from the rail to the hoisting machine, and discharging coal into the basement for the furnace.

"Part of the basement which is not occupied by the furnaces and engines is devoted to the yeast department. A separate and closed room for keeping the yeast cool and free from interference, by means of lock and key, is provided at the east end of the room.

"The furnaces are located and arranged along the southerly line of the basement, having their foundation below it, and upon the arches of the furnaces rest the bottoms or foundations of the ovens, and the superstructure of which rises 30 feet and through two stories of the building.

"The furnaces and boilers connected with the steam engine are situated on the extreme western boundary of the lot, and every precaution has been taken to guard against accident.

"The kneading machine is an entire novelty. It consists of a double headed wooden cylinder, ten feet long by six feet in diameter, fixed in a frame in a horizontal position, and is lined with zinc. The inner heads are connected by two strong cross bars situated on opposite sides, both of which are also sheathed with zinc. By means of these bars the flour, water, and sponge, are thoroughly and perfectly mixed and incorporated. One of these bars is so situated in the cylinder as not only to assist in the mixing process, but at every revolution to clean the sides and surface of the cylinder perfectly. Beside these bars for mixing, there is an eccentric shaft connecting the two inner heads, upon which is suspended a plank-shaped hopper, which at every revolution descends and cuts into the mass of dough at the bottom of the cylinder, and lifts one-half thereof and conveys it upward until it approaches the top, when it suddenly throws at over by means of a simple mechanical arrangement, when it falls from the top to the bottom upon the mass of dough beneath, thus performing, by machinery, the same process which the French bakers perform by hand. This operation is constantly repeated until the whole contents of the kneader, consisting of five or six barrels of flour, is kneaded thoroughly, which is accomplished in about fifteen minutes.

"The loaf-cutter consists of an upright cast-iron zinc cylinder, 6½ feet long and 3½ feet in diameter. A piston or follower is suspended over the cylinder, and by means of a screw, works in it, and compresses the mass of dough which has been received with it, so as to force the same through three apertures in the bottom of the cylinder, with corresponding cavities, in the roller revolving underneath. This roller has eight sets of cavities, of three each, extending across its surface each set corresponding with the three apertures in the cylinders above.—Between the apertures of the cylinder and cavities of the roller is inserted a broad knife of galvanised iron, about the 16th of an inch thick, with three apertures corresponding to those in the cylinder above, and cavities of the roller beneath, and fastened to arms working loose upon the stationary shaft, and receiving a vibratory motion from a crank attached thereto, and which cuts off the loaves as it moves forward, and as it returns draws back the cavity roller with the knife by means of a ratch, and presents the next set of cavities to the aperture in the cylinder, which are filled and cut off as before by every similar movement of the knife and cavity roller. This cavity roller is hollow, and revolves upon a stationary shaft, to which is attached an eccentric, by means of which pistons are forced in and out of the several cavities, and thus presents cavities at the top to receive the dough, and threw out the loaf at the bottom upon an endless apron, which conveys them to the moulding tables. Attached to the loaf cutter is a register, which is worked by the operations of the knife, in such a manner as to record every loaf that is cut from the dough with absolute certainty. There are two ovens, built of brick, having only a narrow alley-way between them, of sufficient width to pass and repass from the front to the rear of the ovens, and are precisely alike, and act independantly of each other.

"The ovens are each 30 feet in height, 24 feet long, and 10 feet wide, and pass through and occupy portions of the first and second stories. Each oven rests upon a furnace, the arch of which forms the lower arch of the oven. A large volume of hot air passes directly through the arch into the oven, and the remainder is conducted to and through the ovens, by means of fire brick tubes, and the temperature is regulated to a certain degree by a self-acting damper attached to a piece of metal, which opens and closes by its contraction or expansion.

"There are four doors or apertures to each oven, two in the first and two in the second story. Within the oven are two endless chains, with projections so constructed as to form a track of sufficient width to receive a bread car. There are twenty-six of these tracks upon the chains, which receive twenty-six cars of dough, and discharge the same baked, at every revolution of the chains, which is made perpendicularly through the ovens, at just that rate of speed which is required to bake the bread perfectly by a single revolution.—Outside, and by the door of the oven, are two waiting or tender cars, which receive the bread cars as they come from the oven, and transport the same from the oven where the bread is discharged to the other door, where the dough is received into the oven. These bread cars consist of a cast iron frame, in which are fitted tiles 1½ inches thick, and so inserted with projections or flanges, so as to cover the iron frame perfectly, and present an entire surface of tile for the car bottom. The only hand labor employed about these ovens is that which is required to place the loaves of dough upon the bread cars, outside of the oven; this being done, machinery take up the job and carries it through to completion.

"The operation of baking is thus: A door on one side of the oven opens of its own accord, and instantly a long arm reaches forth from the back, and with its loaves of dough, and draws it steadily into the oven, and opens the tracks of the endless chain; the door then closes and the car commences its descent upon the same chain. As soon as this door closes, the other door of the oven opens, and a car loaded with baked bread is pushed out by a long arm without a hand, from the oven and along the rails of the endless chain, upon the tender car, which, in the meantime, has removed from the other oven door to receive it. As this bread car is received upon the tender car, it immediately dumps its load of bread and takes its station at the other door of the oven, where it receives a fresh load of dough, and proceeds as before.

"The same operations at the same time are repeated in the lower story of the oven. The dough which goes into the door of the oven on the upper story, is discharged at the corresponding door on the lower story baked; and the dough which goes into the door on the lower story, is discharged at the corresponding door on the upper story, baked; thus the twenty-six bread cars are continually receiving and discharging dough and bread. As fast as the dough is received into the oven at one door, the bread is discharged at the other. The oven is kept continually heated, and at such temperature as is determined; the machinery is kept constantly in motion, and baking is thus going on without intermission.

"The heat in the automatic oven differs entirely from that of the ordinary baker's oven. It is hot air, radiated from brick, like that of the old-fashioned farm house oven; no smoke, ashes or other impurities can enter the chamber of the oven. It is a mistake to suppose that "steam" has anything to do with the baking; it is only used for driving the machinery and heating water."

A Polish Count and an English Spinster.

From the London Times, Dec. 23.

Ladies about to marry distinguished foreigners without much knowledge of their character and previous history, would do well to read all about Count de Waszkowski and the Hon. Mary Jones.

The Hon. Miss Mary Jones, a lady 42 years of age, occupied apartments at No. 64 Ebury street, Pimlico. In the same house there resided a noble Pole, who styled himself the Count de Waszkowski, and give himself out as the son of Prince Wittgenstein. He was 38 years old.—This Polish nobleman calls himself a professor of science and languages, but in reality he lives by "taking on with the ladies." When he has done "with one lady he takes on with another." The Count is the most terrible eyesorer of the day. He was engaged to be married to the plaintiff in "Swynfen vs. Swynfen," that was broken off. Then he was engaged for four years to a Miss Chadwick, but that engagement was also brought to a conclusion by the father upon the occasion of the Count's wishing to borrow £50. Then he proposed for Miss Romney, then for her sister, and it would appear for many ladies besides. In fact the Count gothe living by this sort of thing. The manner in which he opened the trenches upon Miss Jones was as follows:—

He attacked her maid with boquets and letters, which were to be delivered to her mistress. Miss Jones resolved, if possible, to put an end to the annoyance—so that point was astutely enough put by her counsel—by seeing the defendant, and remonstrating with him upon his conduct. this was just what Waszkowski wanted; once admitted, he was sure of victory; he had only to come on in the old style, to rave about his misfortunes—his exile—his noble father—his succession to £40,000 a year when that noble father was gathered to his ancestors. Which of the points told with Miss Jones it is impossible for us to say—£40,000 a year is a good round sum—the lady was 42 years of age, the noble Count but 28—a result followed. The lady, who had sought the interview to chide, remained to console the defendant. Waszkowski, the exile, the noble heir to £40,000 per annum, was to find rest upon her bosom against the unkindly shaft of fate.

As soon as the engagement was entered into, or shortly after—it was very strange—the Count's remittances ceased to arrive with their fore-accustomed regularity. His watch and chain disappeared, and in point of fact, he was under the necessity of borrowing £100 from Miss Jones. In return for this he gave her his note of hand; but, ignorant as he was of our laws and customs, he drew it upon a penny stamp.—When the question of settlements came to be discussed, the lady insisted that all her money should be settled on herself, to which the defendant objected. His system was, that "where honor and affection subsisted, marriage settlements were not required." To this maxim is her turn the lady objected, and so the marriage was broken off. When the rupture was final and complete the lady wished that the sum of money which she had lent to the plaintiff should be returned to her; but this he was unable or unwilling to do, and so the action arose. The defendant pleaded a set-off, the particulars of which included some curious items.

In the first place, we find that the Count de Waszkowski was not attired in such manner as gave satisfaction to the lady. Above all things, on that day, which was to be the happiest in their lives, she wished him to look well. Accordingly, by her direction, and at her request, he proceeded to Messrs. Nicholl's establishment and provided himself with a nuptial equipment at the cost of £10. Again, and before the transaction connected with the wedding, the Count had equally at the plaintiff's request—provided himself with clothes from Messrs. Davies to the value of £27. Again, there was a charge of £15 10s for a guitar bought by the Count for Miss Jones, at her request. This guitar, as he himself stated, he had bought in Clerkenwell. "I did away with the guitar. I refuse to say what I done with it, and I don't mean to tell." This was not enough. A little lower down in the particulars of this set-off there is a charge which is somewhat remarkable:—"To amount paid to pawn-broker by defendant at request of plaintiff, to redeem a watch and chain, the property of the defendant, £21." The defendant, in fact, up to this point tells the charges for money disbursed upon himself and his pleasures and necessities, and coolly carries them to the plaintiff's account.

Then an item of a diamond ring for himself, £15 15s follows, and then items of another character. This noble Pole, the son of Prince Wittgenstein, she her to £40,000 a year, for example, coolly charges Miss Jones with the cost of a wedding ring bought "at her request," 14s.; with a wedding ring at £2 2s; with a photograph of his own noble features at 5s. Such were the particulars of the set-off pleaded by this most chivalrous creature to answer to Miss Jones's demand for a return of her husband, £100. When he was put into the witness box and examined, it appeared by his own confession that he spoke a trifle of this kind of nonsense. His own statement was, that in the Spanish matter he got £300 for the issues of the city's loans. "I have got money from a great many ladies," said Waszkowski, "but I never took a penny from a man in my life." Mr. Prendergast, Q. C., sitting as Judge in the Sheriff's Court, in the city of London, has ruled that despite the notice on the back of their receipts, that the telegraph companies will not be responsible for the accuracy of their messages, unless repeated, and paid for twice over, they are bound to use all possible care and if they blunder egregiously they must pay the penalty. On this ground he decided a case against the Electric and International Telegraph Company.

American Robbers in Paris.

From the London Chronicle, Dec. 25.

Two well dressed men, of gentlemanly manners, went one day last week to the shop of M. Leory, jeweller, in the Palais Royal, and after representing, through an interpreter, that they were Americans, proceeded to select various objects of considerable value, which they directed to be placed aside for them till the next day, when they said they would send and pay for them. They then purchased a silver tooth-pick and some other petty articles, for which they laid down the price, and left. Leory, on arranging the cases which the strangers had examined, perceived that several valuable articles had been abstracted. Before he had recovered from his astonishment, the interpreter came in and claimed the sum which Parisians of gentlemen are accustomed to make to men of his calling who take them good customers; but Leory not doubting that the man, who was an Englishman, was an accomplice of the thieves, had him arrested and taken before the commissary of police. To the commissary, however, the Englishman proved that he was perfectly innocent, and in fact his going to claim his pecuniary showed him to be so, and he was released. On inquiry it appeared that the two Americans had robbed several other jewellers, among them M. Bury, Boulevard des Italiens, of a very valuable diamond ring. Three or four days after the robbery of Leory, the police read in a London newspaper an account of the arrest at Southampton of two suspected thieves just arrived from France, and having in their possession a quantity of jewellery. The description given of a diamond ring found on them left little doubt that it was that which had been stolen from Bury. The police of Paris in consequence made a communication to the English police, and the latter had the two men sent to Paris where they arrived yesterday.

Canadian Banks and National Education.

Of all countries Canada has reason to be proud of two things—her banking institutions and her system of national education—subjects which are not yet mastered in England. The chartered banks of Canada have stood firmly through the crisis of 1837, 1847, and 1857, and the province has progressed more rapidly in the ratio of wealth and population than even the United States. The causes of the solid progress are ascribed by authorities who have studied the history of this advance, to the natural resources of the country and its new commercial geographical position, since the spread of population in the Western States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, and the projected connection by means of the Grand Trunk Railway with the Eastern States of the Union at Portland, the most commodious harbour in the United States, which makes Canada the middle place of the whole frame-work through which the vast trade of the West with the seaboard and Europe must eventually pass by water and railway so far as the capabilities of both can accommodate it. When the Victoria Bridge at Montreal is completed in 1860, the line of transit will be the most complete in the world. Some idea of the magnitude of this work may be formed when it is compared with the Britannia Bridge, its length being five times as great, and yet the cost, spread over the whole railway mileage will not be more than £10,000 per mile. But for the settlement of the Western States, Canada would have remained a cul de sac, and might have been left for years without a Trunk Railway or Victoria Bridge. From the trunk system the country is being opened out by municipal railways running at right angles, roads attract settlers, their forests are soon cleared, and thriving farms are the reward of labor. The bank charters in Canada are sufficiently stringent in compelling specie convertibility of the note circulation, but they have the power of suspending for 60 days with forfeiture of charter. This privilege, however, has never been exercised, except during the rebellion of 1837, when all the bullion was sent to Quebec as a matter of safety. A bad harvest in England or Europe is Canada's opportunity; what cripples trade in Europe advances the prosperity of Canada and the Western States in money. Every crisis in Europe has also teaded to an exodus of the laboring classes, and 1858 is expected to furnish a large immigration. This great traffic has hitherto gone by the way of New York, but next year fully one-half is expected to be diverted to the Eastern ports of Portland and Quebec, as the nearest and cheapest route. It is, indeed, a singular fact, that the capabilities of Canada have not hitherto been sufficiently appreciated or understood.—London Globe.

ROYAL BRITISH BANK—PROCEEDINGS OF THE ASSIGNEES.—The task of the Assignees of the late Royal British Bank to carry out the compromise proposed some months since, and for which the act of Parliament of the last session was intended to give increased facilities, is by no means an easy or pleasant one. Two or three of the trade assignees meet almost daily for the purpose of examining and cross-examining those of the shareholders who are willing to contribute towards the fund required to carry out the arrangement. The process of examination is a searching one. All the secrets of trades and professions are disclosed, the nature of marriage settlements are enquired into, the present position, future prospects, and the existing liabilities are explained; and those terrible judges, from whom there is no appeal, decide whether the sum offered to be paid in each case in such as the means of the party would warrant them in accepting. One or two instances have occurred in which shareholders who have offered to pay four or five hundred pounds have been found to be clearly capable of paying as many thousands—in some cases legal proceedings have been commenced, and in others a compromise has been entertained. Negotiations for the sale of the Welch mining property have been going on for some time. The works have been carried on by the assignees, and a slight profit has resulted from the working. Some offers for the purchase of the property have been made through Mr. Wyldes, whose knowledge of mining affairs has been of great service to the creditors of the company, in connection with the valuation and management of the mines and works. The prices offered, and the terms of payment, have varied considerably. The property will, there is little doubt, realise between twenty and thirty thousand pounds.

South Carolina papers say the sentiment of that State are rapidly coalescing to other parties.

The Illinois Penitentiary is now full, having five hundred and twenty-four convicts confined in it.

Toronto Markets.

TORONTO, Jan. 16, 1858.

In consequence of the disagreeable weather yesterday, the market was but poorly supplied. For wheat, there was a slightly improved demand, and all offering moved off freely at 80c to 90c (4s to 4s 6d) per bushel for good to prime, and 70c (3s 6d) for inferior, for distilling purposes. There was more competition observable, induced by a speculative demand for shipment east.

Flour is very dull, although we notice a slightly better enquiry at very low rates, say $3 50 to $4 for Superfine to Extra. The holding figures are variously stated at $3 50 for Superfine; $3 75, for Fancy; 4 and $4 25 for Extra.

New York Markets.

GRAIN—Wheat market firm; 9000 bush. Milwaukee Club sold at $1.05 @ $1,06. Rye nominal at 72c @ 73c. Barley quiet and unchanged. Corn—firmer for new, nothing doing in old, and price nominal, at 73c @ 74c. Oats quiet and unaltered.

PROVISIONS.—Mess pork firm, and prime lower; sales 400 brls. at $14.75 @ $14,80 for mess, and $11,75 @ $12 for prime. Beef dull and declining. Dressed hogs buoyant at 6½c Lard firm; sales 800 brls at 8½c @ 9½c. Butter dull, at 11c @ 15c for Ohio; 12½c @ 18c for State.—Cheese dull at 6c @ 8c.

THE GREAT WONDER OF THE AGE—A NEW ERA DAWNING upon the comfort of pen and ink. A valuable and wonderful discovery.

BENDY'S PORTABLE INK.

An entirely new article, by the discovery of which Pen and Ink are rendered useless. It can be used as a

Writing, Copying, or Indelible Ink,

For either of which it can truly be called the ne plus ultra of the kind. For Writing

It possesses all the beauty of Gold Ink. It is jet black, and so permanent as not to be removed by the strongest oxalic acid. Hence its great value in writing deeds, wills, and other valuable papers. As it will not blot nor crack, it is highly commendable for the use of book-keepers and writers generally. For

Copying,

It works wonderfully. Three, or even four copies can be made at one writing, thus dispensing with the copying machines and the trouble attending it. By a process recently discovered, embroidery patterns, pictures, etc, can be copied accurately on cloth, wood, steel

PATENT
ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and as much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its Beauty.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth Its Durability.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its Cheapness.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE VOLUME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed [post-paid] to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

☞ Sir William Don lately had a benefit in Bristol, at which he thus referred to his arrest for debts and pecuniary involvements generally:—Before I retire I hope that you will allow me to say a few words to the young men present. Depend upon it, there is no such demon as debt. I have suffered from it all my lifetime; ever since I was thirteen I have been constantly in debt. I hope now to get rid of the burden, and I assure you that I will take very good care not to get into debt again. Should there be any fast young gentlemen present—and I dare say there are many of them—I would say, look at me and this long monumental warning. (Roars of laughter.) If you wish to keep a horse and cannot afford it—if you wish to go to Bath, and ride fast, take a second class ticket by the railway. (Renewed laughter.) I speak from experience, and I tell you that if you can take the ready money in your hand, whether to buy a leg of mutton or a pair of kid gloves, you will get all the advantage, and all the happiness, that independence too.—(Cheers and laughter.) Our old friend in "David Copperfield," Mr. Micawber, is quite right, when he says, "Income, £20 1s; expenditure, £20 0s; total, misery. Income, £20; expenditure, £19 19s 11½d; total, happiness."

More Important Items from the Mormon Country.

From the Alta California, Dec. 18.

We were favoured, last evening, with a visit from William H. Wilson, Esq., with whom were entrusted the duties and papers of the U. S. Surveyor General's Office at Salt Lake City, on the departure of General Burr for Washington. With him was Mr. Wm. Bell, the bearer of the late news already published from Utah. Both of these gentlemen have resided for many months among the Mormons, and from their constant association with them in trade and otherwise, have had ample opportunity of judging of the real intentions of Brigham Young and his infatuated people. Mr. Wilson only left Salt Lake City when, by the course pursued by the Saints, he was convinced that they were firmly bent on carrying their point, to the shedding of blood, if the troops could not be kept from entering the valley in any other way. The office of the United States Surveyor General had been seized and closed by the Mormons, and the property in it taken to the residence of Brigham Young. Finding himself unable to obtain redress, the laws of the United States set at defiance, and his own safety among these crazy fanatics only problematical, he determined to avail himself of apparently the only chance offering to escape from the country, and joined the train of Mr. Bell. Mr. Wilson has been engaged in making surveys in the region of Salt Lake, and is perfectly well informed as to the topography of the country.—Although quite certain that a collision between the troops and the Mormons has taken place before the present date, in which opinion he was joined by Mr. Bell, he has faith in the news of the fight at Hamb's Fork, arriving lately by the way of Oregon. Had such a battle taken place the Saints would not have allowed the intelligence to go out of their country, and they had every means of egress completely guarded. The defiles of Echo Pass, Weber River and Probo Pass were strongly garrisoned by them, and the country to the northward of Salt Lake, in the direction of Fort Hall, was impassible after early in November. But in addition to these facts, which seem to show that the news of an encounter could not have gone out through the Mormons, they (our informants) believe that no such fight as is reported took place. The intelligence of the battle, of which no date is given, reached us by way of Oregon, and our despatches are dated at Portland, November 27, and the news, if such it was, had been there since the 24th. Messrs. Wilson and Bell left Salt Lake City on the 8th of November, and no battle had then taken place, as mounted couriers were constantly passing between Echo Canon and the city, conveying news, and getting over the distance (113 miles) in ten hours. Had the fight occurred on the 10th, it would be giving but fourteen days for the intelligence to have gone over the vast region lying between Ham's Fork and Walla Walla, a distance of not much less than one thousand miles. At this season of the year it would seem impossible that the news could have gone in that time, and yet the Indian couriers are said to have performed journeys equally remarkable. Another fact calculated to discredit the intelligence of the battle is, that Col. Alexander, or whoever commanded the troops, would have availed himself of similar means to send information to Oregon; and it is also remarkable that the officer in command in Oregon must have disbelieved the news, as he forwarded no despatches relating to it to General Clarke, in this city. But whatever of discredit may attach to the battle rumor, our informants believe that the two armies were engaged very shortly after their departure, which was on the 5th.

Mr. Bell had an interview with Young on the 7th. The Mormon chief was most emphatic in his denunciations of the government, and frequently repeated his declaration, "I say that the troops shall never enter this valley," the words uttered slowly and with great emphasis. Mr. Bell asked him if he considered himself able to cope with the United States. "Cope with them!" was the answer; "Cope with them! I am determined never to allow such men as Buchanan is sending here to come and lord it over us. We are determined to resist. The Mormon faith will continue and flourish, and the Lord will protect his own. If the troops attempt to enter we will destroy them." Mr. Bell says the speaker uttered these words slowly and firmly, and in a manner which showed he was in earnest.—He thinks, however, that Young has a wholesome dislike of gunpowder himself, and Kimball is no more enamored of danger than his superior.

The Mormon force which destroyed the waggon trains consisted of about five hundred mounted men. From fifty to one hundred had been sent out from the city to guard the different passes for some two weeks before Mr. Bell left. Parties of mounted horsemen had for several days galloped, in Comanche style close up to the troops, with the intention of stampeding the horses, but had not in any case succeeded. The strictest orders had been given not to fire upon them, unless in return for a similar greeting on the part of the Mormons. On the route to San Bernardino Mr. Bell met seven Mormon waggons from the Los Vigos lead mines, loaded with lead for bullets, and bound into Salt Lake City. The last intelligence from the eastward represented that all communication with Fort Laramie was cut off, and that there was three feet of snow on the South Pass. The road to San Bernardino was open, and the party passing over its entire length. The inhabitants of San Bernardino forwarded by the Sarpise a numerously signed petition to General Clarke, setting forth that they had good reason to fear a descent of the Mormons from Utah to drive off their cattle, and requesting that some United States officers might be sent there to drill the volunteers, who were making preparations for defence. This is, doubtless, a needless alarm. The Mormons have quite enough on their hands, without invading the distant territories of their Gentile enemies.

TROUBLE AMONG THE WOMEN.

Elder John Young, in his speech on the 25th of October, rebukes the sisters for their conduct in the absence of the brethren. He says:—

I understand that some of the sisters have a great many things to attend to. I have understood that since our brethren have gone, the sisters have undertaken to set things in order in the family; and I think they had better let that alone. I know the devil will try every stratagem, and if he cannot make an inroad in one place he will in another; if he cannot get into brethren he will try to get into their families, and he will work there, and set them at variance with each other.

And Brother Kimball, in addressing the women, says:—You do not have to go out to fight, and you should think of this when you are gadding about from one place to the other, you that have so much visiting to do that you even visit on Sundays too. I want to know why such ones are not serving their God and taking care of that which is put into their hands.

Now, am I hard upon the sisters? No; the good woman sits here and says it is Heaven to her to listen to such teachings. I do not wish to say anything to such persons, but it is those that are guilty that I am after.

Do I want to hurt your feelings? No, I would not for my right arm; but stop going to Brother Brigham with your little family affairs. I hardly ever go to Brother Brigham's office, but there are some sisters there, sometimes from ten to twenty in a day, and some few come to me, but not many.

Do I advise a woman to leave her husband? No; but says I, go home, make peace and be a comfort to your husband.—Do I advise a man to leave his wife? No, but I tell him to go home and nourish her, comfort her and clothe her, and then see that she does her duty. I will admit that there are some women who cannot be controlled.

I have one or two women that I cannot control, and never did; and I would just as soon try to control a rebellious mule as to control them. I have not given them a word of counsel for the last eight years but what they have murmered or rebelled against, and called me a hard man. I have not told you who they are, but I know them.

Is it wrong to speak of these things? I have one or two women that I cannot control and never did. "Do you support them?" says one. Yes, as well as the best women I have; and if you ask me why I do it, it is because I want to get along with them as well as I can in this life; but I tell you that if the time comes when I am obliged to desert and lay waste my habitation, I will then lug them no more.

When I think of those things that exist among some of this people, I am grieved.—"Do you not quarrel, Brother Heber," says one? No, I do not; but when a woman begins to dispute me, about nine times out of ten I get up and say, "Go it," and then go off about my business; and if ever I am so foolish as to quarrel with a woman, I ought to be whipped, for you may always calculate they will have the last word.

I know that there are some quarrelsome individuals, but I do not want such spirits about me.

When I sleep I have fifteen shooters, six shooters, and all other kind of shooters, and the devils do not come there; and if they succeed in troubling me they have got to get into some other person's body. I have left the devil's kingdom and enlisted in the kingdom of Jesus, and I never intend to turn away from it.

As for our enemies, they never can injure us, but they will make their heaviest strides against us. And it will not be long before the world will turn over its riches to us. And I know it. If you only live faithful, you will never be driven to the necessity of burning up your houses, your lumber, nor your fruit trees.

Our peach and apple trees are beginning to bear fruit, and we may just as well eat the fruit from them as not. But if we do not live up to our religion we may have to go into the mountains and take it Indian fashion.

The United States have robbed the Indians, and now they are trying to afflict us, and they will go to hell with all the nations that forget God.

Message of President Buchanan upon the Central American Affairs.

The following is the message of President Buchanan upon the arrest of General Walker, as transmitted to the American Senate on Thursday last, in answer to a call from that body for information on Central American affairs:—

In submitting to the Senate the papers for which they have called, I deem it proper to make a few observations. In capturing Gen. Walker and his command after they had landed on the soil of Nicaragua, Com. Paulding has, in my opinion, committed a grave error. It is quite evident, however, from the communication herewith transmitted, that this was done from pure and patriotic motives, and in the sincere conviction that he was promoting the interests and vindicating the honor of his country.

In regard to Nicaragua, she has sustained no injuries by the act of Com. Paulding. This has cleared in her benefit, and relieved her from a dreaded invasion. She, alone, would have any right to complain of the violation of her territory, and it is quite certain that she will never exercise that right. It unquestionably does not belong to her invaders to complain in her name. She has been restored by Com. Paulding, from their assaults. The error of this gallant officer consists in exceeding his instructions, and landing his sailors and marines in Nicaragua, whether with or without her consent, for the purpose of making war on any military force whatever, which he might find in the country, no matter from whence they came.

This power certainly did not belong to him. Obedience to law, and conformity to instructions, are the best guides for all officers, civil and military, and when they transcend these limits, and act upon their own personal responsibility, evil consequences almost invariably follow. Under these circumstances, when Marshal Ryder's presented himself at the State Department, on the 29th ultimo, with Gen. Walker in his custody, the Secretary informed him that the executive department of government did not recognize Walker as a prisoner; that it had no directions to give concerning him, and that it was only through the action of the judiciary that he could be lawfully held in custody to answer any charges that might be brought against him.

Thus far disapproving the conduct of Commodore Paulding, no inference must be drawn that I am less determined than I have ever been to execute the neutrality laws of the United States. This is my imperative duty, and I shall continue to perform it by all the means which the Constitution and laws place in my power. My opinion of the value and importance of those laws corresponds entirely with that expressed by Mr. Munroe in his Message to Congress of Dec. 7, 1809. That wise, prudent and patriotic statesman says it is of the highest importance to our national character, and indispensable to the morality of our citizens, that all violations of our neutrality laws should be prevented. No door should be left open for evasion of our laws, no opportunity afforded to any who may be disposed to take advantage of it to compromise the interests or honor of the nation.

The crime of setting on foot, or providing the means for military expeditions within the United States, to make war against a foreign State with whom we are at peace, is one of an aggravated and dangerous character, and early engaged the attention of Congress. Whether the Executive possesses any or what power under the Constitution independently of Congress, to prevent or punish this and similar offences against the law of nations, was a subject which engaged the attention of our most eminent statesmen in the time of the administration of Gen. Washington on the occasion of the French revolution. The act of Congress of June 5, 1794, fortunately removed all the difficulties on this question which had heretofore existed. The fifth and seventh sections of this act, which relate to the present question, are the same in substance with the six and eight sections of the act of April 20, 1818, which have now been in force for a period of more than 60 years.

A military expedition, rendered criminal by the act, must have its beginning or be set on foot in the United States; but the great object of the law was to save foreign States, with whom we are at peace, from the ravages of those lawless expeditions proceeding from our shores. The eleventh section alone, therefore, which simply defines the crime and its punishment fully, has been made quite to accomplish this purpose, and enforce our international duties. In order to render the law effectual, it was necessary to prevent the carrying on of such expeditions to their consummation, after they have succeeded in leaving our shores. This has been done effectually, and in clear and explicit language, by the authority given to the President under the eighth section of the act, to employ the land and naval forces of the United States for the purpose of preventing the carrying on of any such expedition or enterprise from the territory or domain of any foreign prince or State, any colony, district or people, with whom the United States are at peace.

For these reasons, had Commodore Paulding intercepted the steamer Fashion, with Gen. Walker and his command on board, at any period before she entered the port of San Juan de Nicaragua, and conducted them back to Mobile, this would have prevented them from carrying on the expedition, and have been not only a justifiable but a praiseworthy act. This well deserves the severe punishment inflicted upon him by our laws. It violates the principles of Christianity, morality and humanity, held sacred by all civilized nations, and by none more than the people of the United States. Disguise it as we may, such a military expedition is an invitation to reckless and lawless men to enlist under the banner of an adventurer, to rob, plunder and murder the unoffending citizens of neighboring States, who had never done them harm.

It is an usurpation of the war-making power, which belongs, alone, to Congress. The government itself—at least, in the estimation of the world—becomes an accomplice in the commission of the crime, unless it adopts all the means necessary to prevent and punish it. It would be far better, and more in accordance with the bold and manly spirit of our government and countrymen, for the government itself to set up such expeditions, than to allow them to proceed under the command of irresponsible adventurers. We could then, at least, exercise some control over our own agents, and prevent them from burning down cities, and committing other acts of enormity of which we have read. The avowed principle which lies at the foundation of the law of nations is the divine command that all things "whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." Tried by this unerring rule, we should be severely condemned if we should not use our best exertions to arrest such expeditions against the feeble sister Republic of Nicaragua.

One thing is very certain, that a people never existed who would sooner call any nation to a stricter account, than we should ourselves for tolerating the lawless expeditions from their shores to make war upon any portion of our territories. By tolerating such expeditions, we should soon lose the high character which we have enjoyed ever since the days of Washington, for a faithful performance of international obligations and duties, and inspire distrust against us among the members of the great family of nations. But if motives of duty were not sufficient to restrain us from encouraging daith lawless enterprises, our evident interest ought to dictate this policy. These expeditions are the most effectual mode of retarding American progress, although to promote this is the avowed object of the leaders and contributors in such undertakings. It is, beyond question, the destiny of our race, to spread themselves over the Continent of North America; and this at no distant day, should events be permitted to take their own natural course.

The tide of emigration will flow to the South, and nothing can eventually arrest its progress. If permitted to go there peacefully, Central America will soon contain an American population, which will confer blessings and benefits on the natives and their respective governments, and liberty, under restraint of law will preserve domestic peace, while the different transit routes across the Isthmus, in which we are so deeply interested, will have assured protection. Nothing has retarded this happy condition of affairs so much as the unlawful expeditions which have been fitted out in the United States, to make war upon Central American States. Had one-half the number of American citizens who miserably perished in the first disastrous expedition of Gen. Walker, settled in Nicaragua as peaceful emigrants, the object which we all desire would, ere this, have been in a great degree accomplished.

These expeditions have caused the people of the Central American States to regard us with dread and suspicion. It is our policy to remove this apprehension, and convince them that we intend to do them good, and not evil. We desire, as the leading power on this continent, to open, and if need be, protect every transit route across the Isthmus, not only for our own benefit, but for that of the world; and thus open a free access to Central America, and through it, to our Pacific possessions.

This policy was commenced under favorable auspices, when the expedition under the command of General Walker, escaped from our territories, and proceeded to Punta Arenas. Should another expedition, of a similar character, again evade the vigilance of our officers, and proceed to Nicaragua, this would be fatal, at least for a season, to the peaceful settlement of these countries, and to the policy of American progress. The truth is, that no Administration can successfully conduct the foreign affairs of the country in Central America, or anywhere else, if it is to be interfered with at every step, by lawless military expeditions, set on foot in the United States.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

Lunatics in Scotland.

From the London Times.

In a return which has just been published of the weekly sums allowed during the last five years for the maintenance of those pauper lunatics in Scotland who are exempted from confinement, we hope that we see one of the last rags of a barbarism which has passed away for ever. We trust that the Act which last session received the sanction of the Legislature, and provided for the proper treatment and maintenance of lunatics in Scotland, will prevent, as far as any Act of Parliament can, a recurrence of those enormities which early in the present year the report of the Scottish Lunacy Commission brought to light. But, without venturing to doubt the value of that measure, it is well also to remember that its success must depend not less on the vigilance of officials than on the interest which the Scottish public takes in it; and we do think that the facts published in the present return exhibit an amount of ignorance, of cruelty, and pennriousness on the part of Scotchmen that is indeed astounding. It seems like a mockery to give to a pauper lunatic a weekly allowance of 4½d or 6¾d. Sometimes the allowance is increased to four or five shillings, and there is one instance in which it is stated at 17s 6d., but the usual dole is from one shilling up to three. By way of making up for the smallness of the pecuniary allowances other assistance is given in a few instances.—Here a man gets a shilling "and one peck of meal;" there another gets 11d. "and a horse;" a third gets 2s 6d. "and clothes provided;" a fourth gets 2s 6d., "with clothes and shoes," which seems to imply that those for whom clothes alone are provided are allowed to go barefooted. In one case there is a fine distinction observed as to the precise items of clothing which are to be supplied,—the poor man, in addition to his allowance of 1s., has "bed and body clothes and shoes provided."—Sometimes the pecuniary grant is withheld altogether, and we find against certain names such an entry as this—"Clothing only supplied by the Board; gets his board for his work as a farm servant." Or, there is the case of a girl who gets nothing whatever—"no special allowance, but her father's increased on her account." There are actually cases in which the patient is still so ill as to require attendance, and for whom a nurse is provided, while the whole weekly allowance which the nurse is permitted to spend for the lunatic is 2s 6d.—In glancing one's eye over such a list, it seems almost a relief to find that in a considerable number of cases the lunatics are received into the poorhouse. Their treatment as mere paupers in the poorhouse, although in itself most unsuitable to their condition, is at least a shade or two better than the cruelty involved in farming them out to contractors for a few pence, from which they expect to make some profit, however little. The Lord-Advocate declared, in the debate on the second reading of his Lunatics Bill, that the Board of Supervision spend three or four hours a week in considering applications for increased allowances; that no part of their duty is discharged more ably than this; and that, though the idea is prevalent that the allowances are a great deal too low, he should be very sorry to commit himself to that opinion, as it would be improper to judge of the habits and the wants of the lower orders in Scotland from the habits and the necessities of the similar class in England. It is such a statement, coming from the very author of the Lunatic Bill, and made in the speech in which the proposal for its second reading first compels us to call attention to the actual reliefs.

Even if we take the most favourable view as to the position of these lunatics who are exempted from confinement, and who receive these paltry pittances—if we suppose that in certain cases they are under the care of relatives, and that while the ratepayers advance so much, or rather so little, for their support, friends provide the rest—the system is utterly indefensible.—What is the sort of fare which a lunatic receives in a pauper family happy to get 4½d. or 6¾. a-week for his maintenance? It must be of the most stinted kind, and stinted nourishment is the destruction of the lunatic. Under the old barbarous style of treatment, indeed, which relied on bread and water and starvation, this fare would be considered most appropriate: but now about the most potent cure for the mysterious maladies of the brain is a diet that is generous without exciting, and the offer of 4½ for the maintenance of a lunatic is but an offer to maintain and confirm his lunacy. From another point of view also the paltry assistance furnished in such cases by the Poor Law officer will appear culpable in the extreme. Is there to be no surveillance of the insane? Every traveller in Scotland must have been struck with the number of lunatics who are always at large, and who may be found now in the streets followed in full cry by a troop of boys, now in some church devoutly singing at the height of the voice and muttering incessantly, now suddenly starting up like a fiend in some moorland solitude. And what is the consequence of not properly looking after these unhappy wretches?—What does the country gain by starving its pauper lunatics on a miserable groat a week? It gains a family of imbeciles. It is well known in what a promiscuous way large numbers of the lower classes live,—how many beds in a room, how many sleepers in a bed, and how men and women huddle together without the slightest sense of decency. The consequence we find in our reports as to the number of idiot mothers—a number that is concealed as much as possible, in order to screen from just punishment those who permitted such a wrong.—In one small parish in the North of Scotland there were not less than five of such imbecile women who had become mothers when the Commissioners were making their inquiries. It thus happens that to save the allowance of one imbecile the country is endowed by a family of imbeciles.

But the worst of it is, that by such niggardly allowances the pauper lunatics are subjected to the most terrible and loathsome treatment. We hope that the old method of treating madness, which was as horrible in its details as the most cruel system of penal discipline which has yet been invented, had, at least in this country been almost wholly abolished. All disease is more or less penal, and in many cases the remedy also comes to us with the penal touch,—it is a sharp knife, or a bitter draught, or a forced imprisonment. But the pains of disease and the unpleasantness of the remedy are in most cases mitigated by the soothing of friends and all the comfort which it is in their power to supply. To the lunatical one under the exploded system was this mitigation of suffering denied; he was subjected to a physical restraint and to lowering diet, that only served to develope his malady, and when he had worn out the resources of those who loved him best he was consigned to a gloomy madhouse, which was literally hell upon earth, while it was the severest trial to those who cared for him to know that in committing him to this frightful abode they gave him up to indescribable torments, which were to end only with his life. The report of Scottish Lunacy Commissioners proved to the world that this inhuman system still retains its vitality in the northern part of the island. By day oppressed with fetters and manacles, by night laying naked three or four in a bed of straw without covering of any kind, rolling in filth and starving to desperation, the poor wretches who in their helplessness, had passed into the hands of men whose only object was to keep them as cheaply and as long as possible, led a life in comparison with which that of a well-fed pig in a sty seems a sort of a parapisacal existence. Such ignominious treatment is but the natural result of penurious payment and imperfect supervision. It is surely evident, on every ground of expediency and humanity, that the system should be reversed and the allowances largely increased; and it may help to show the immense importance of regarding this class of the community with no niggardly wisdom if we state a fact which may not be generally known. The total number of lunatics in Scotland is 7,803, and of this number 3,904 are paupers.—What does this mean? It means that the pauper population of Scotland supply more than half the total number of lunatics in the kingdom. There is a direct connection between pauperism and lunacy. Poverty and mania act and react on each other, and it is at once a cruel system and a false economy which could lead the Poor Law Board to reduce to a minimum the amount of relief afforded to a pauper lunatic. It has been one of the theories of the poor Law—understood, if not boldly expressed—that pauper relief should be rendered as disagreeable as possible, in order that no one may apply for it except in cases of extreme need; and, if we may judge from the returns before us, it is pretty evident that a similar system has been extended to lunacies, without the officials perceiving the distinction between poverty and disease.—After the report of the Commissioners, and after the Bill of last session, the publication of a return which makes disclosures such as these ought now to be an anachronism, and notwithstanding the approving statement of the Lord Advocate, we trust, that we may accept this paper as a mere relic of the past and as a mere promise of change.

Some idea may be had of the amount of silver coin lost by the American Treasury Mint to the merchants of Philadelphia, when we state that it took sixteen double horse waggons to convey it from the Bank to the Railroad Depot the shipment.

The Pacific Railroad Recommended by the President.

ITS EFFECTS ON ENGLAND'S EASTERN TRADE.

From the London Post, Dec. 25.

Almost from the time of the discovery of America—almost from the day when Nunez de Bilboa first caught a glimpse of the great South Sea—various projects have been formed for the purpose of effecting an easy means of communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. But ages passed, and during those periods the Spaniard, the foreign lord of the soil, with the listlessness of his race, paid little attention to any measure which would have developed the material prosperity of the fertile regions which he had conquered by the sword. When the transatlantic empire of Spain had passed from the sovereignty of the Most Catholic King; when its place had been supplied by the weak and inefficient dominion of various independent republics, the mixed Spanish and Creole population had neither the means nor the inclination to provide facilities for commerce which would have increased their wealth and given solidity to their national power. The enterprise and energy of the Anglo Saxon race have, however, been brought to bear upon that great and important isthmus, which is occupied by the republican States of Central America. The Panama Railroad has now for some years united the two oceans, and farther to the north a wealthy Anglo-American company is engaged in the construction of an inter-oceanic railway between Porto Cabello and the Bay of Fonseca. The importance of these communications in reference to the trade of California, Australia, and the islands of the Pacific, it is impossible to estimate too highly; and when the disputes which have arisen between England and the United States on the subject of Central America shall have received a just and honourable settlement, we have a confident belief that European and American capital and enterprise will be largely applied to promote the internal improvement of every portion of these most interesting and valuable regions.

The message recently communicated to Congress by the President of the United States, recommends the construction of a railroad across the Continent for the purpose of military defence. The line suggested by Mr. Buchanan will pass through some of the newly acquired territories of the United States to the sea-board of the Pacific. Mr. Buchanan adds that the difficulties connected with an undertaking of this description have been greatly exaggerated, and that by a wise expenditure of public money, assisted by private enterprise and free grants of land, this line, of no much importance on military as well as commercial grounds, might at some distant day be completed. Here we may mention that some years ago an American citizen proposed the construction of another line stretching from Lake Michigan, between which lake and New York there is already steam communication, and proceeding thence through the far West to California. The projector of this scheme asked for no grant of public money, but merely that thirty miles of the waste lands on either side of the proposed road should be conceded to the company to enable them to accomplish this gigantic work. Mr. Whitney's scheme, although it received the sanction of many separate States, still remains in that category of useful projects which from their magnitude and expensive character, are favorably considered, whilst they are rarely, if ever, called into execution. We do not intend to institute any comparison between the two routes which have been suggested by Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Whitney. But it must be obvious to the most superficial understanding, that the opening of any inter-oceanic line through the territory of the United States, would effect as great a revolution in the trade of the world as that which was brought about by the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope route to India and to the other countries of the East.—The trade of China, Japan, and of regions comparatively unknown, would be impelled to the Pacific terminus of the railroad, whence it would be carried to the great Atlantic ports, to be afterwards distributed over America and Europe. Hong Kong, Shanghae, Canton, and the other marts of Chinese trade would be brought by steam within a few days' distance of the great American emporium which would spring up on the coast of the Pacific. If a facility of this kind existed, the most important and lucrative trade in the world would fall into the hands of the people of the United States and the long voyages round the Cape, or round the Horn, would nearly be undertaken for any purpose of commercial gain. Whilst the citizens and the government of the United States are perfectly alive to the advantages which their country would derive from the possession of the great "highway of nations," the merchant princes and rich capitalists of England appear almost to have forgotten that in British North America there exist vast regions admirably adapted for the construction of a railway, by means of which England could, as at present, defy the competition of the world. The position of British North America is peculiarly favorable both as regards physical geography and means of speedy communication. The distance between the north-west point of Lake Superior and the Straits of Fuca and the Pacific is estimated not to exceed sixteen or eighteen hundred miles,—just double the length of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada.—From the recent investigations of Professor Palliser, it appears there are large portions of level prairie lands, and that the most formidable difficulty, which the projectors of such an undertaking would have to encounter would be the discovery of some pass or gorge in the Rocky Mountains, permitting the construction of a railway. But no one can help such an obstacle to be insurmountable, when on the same continent the crossing of a Cordilleran has been effected by a bridge of two miles length, the summit of the mighty St. Lawrence. In 1851 the scheme of which we have given an outline was submitted to the Legislature of Canada da, by a gentleman of the name of Allen Macdonald. The scheme was rejected by a committee, on the technical ground that the projector had not obtained the necessary capital; but the report distinctly stated that the construction of such a railroad was not only desirable, but practicable, and ought at some future time to be undertaken. If the Grand Trunk Railway were continued to Halifax, the route up to the lakes would be completed from a British port accessible throughout the year.—The construction of a railway running to northwest of Lake Superior and onwards to the Pacific would terminate the line.—The expenses of this undertaking have been estimated at ten or twelve millions—a sum insignificant when compared with the profits of that stream of wealth which would flow from the east through British territory to Britain herself. The abolition of the Hudson's Bay monopoly and the construction of Vancouver's Island as a British colony will attract hardy and enterprising settlers to the hitherto neglected regions bordering upon the North Pacific, and whether or not the formation of this great intercoeanic communication be speedily undertaken, a new Liverpool will spring up in that part of the world, affording a centre for British trade and British industry.

With iron, coal and timber on the spot, the railway then would become a matter of comparatively little difficulty. Commencing at both ends, and advancing with the progress of the population, it would eventually meet, and thus that iron girdle would be placed around the continent, subjecting territories which are now lying waste and unproductive to the beneficent dominion of civilization and commerce, and maintaining in British hands that superior authority which would seem to be the heritage of the Anglo-Saxon race.

The Designs of the Mormons.

From the New York Herald.

The telegraph and the news brought by the "Star of the West" from the Great Salt Lake, indicate that the Mormons contemplate removing to the British possessions in the spring. Doubts are thrown upon the story, and it is possible the wish on the part of their assailants may have been father to the thought. But there are reasons why the rumor may be true. It is known that for some time past Brigham Young has been having a very thorough survey made of the country lying to the north of Utah, especially the banks of the river Columbia. We hear that latterly he has despatched orders to his scattered disciples in California and in the southern part of the Territory of Utah to join him at Salt Lake City without delay; and that, accordingly, notwithstanding the season, trains were en route for the Mormon head-quarters from the South and the Southwest. The country along the Columbia is admirably adapted for settlement and cultivation; much more so than any other which is open to the Mormons on the Pacific.

There is another reason why Brigham Young may have turned his attention to the British possessions as a new resting place. No Southern hegira would place the Mormons out of reach of the American eagle. If they emigrated to Mexico, they would find the United States troops there before ten years elapse, asserting dominion over the country; if they went to Central America the same objection would hold good there. Indeed, the settled expansion of the United States in a southern and southwesterly direction must necessarily close this continent, or the southern and central portion of it, to any category of people, race, tribe or community which is known to be obnoxious to or to have rebelled against the laws of the United States. There is no home for them there. But in the North the case is different. We are not expanding northward. There is no desire on any one's part to seize any portion of Canada or the Hudson's Bay Territory. Nor, in all human probability is any such desire likely to arise. It is too cold up there for filibustering; and till all our own territory is fully occupied we shall not pay much attention to what is north of us.

Furthermore, it must not be forgotten that the bulk of the Mormons are Englishmen, whose attachment to their native flag is strong, and whose ancient patriotism this last affront by the government of the United States is likely to have aroused in full force. The English Mormons no doubt hanker after a return to an English country; and as they constitute a large proportion of the counsellors and soldiers of Brigham Young, they may be expected to exercise a very potent influence opposed to further endurance in the United States, and in favour of peaceable migration to a country where they probably flatter themselves they could prosecute their religion unmolested.

It might be supposed that the English, who express so much horror of Mormonism, would be as ready to oppose their arrival in their territory as we should be glad to see them leave ours. But it is to be remembered that the British territory along the Columbia, where the Mormons would settle if they went north, forms part of the dominion of the Hudson's Bay Company, and the British and Canadian governments have very little right to meddle with it. Of course, the domestic arrangements of steady industrious settlers would be of no consequence to the officers of the Hudson's Bay Company. So long as their land was tilled, large crops grown, and good rents paid, they would never ask whether their farmers kept one or twenty wives. In point of fact, as is very well known, polygamy is already an institution so well recognized in that region that a factor or commander of a post who has but two wives is regarded as unusually moderate in his desires, as not altogether mindful of the responsibilities of his station. The Indian traders would be of one mind with the Mormons on that point.

On the whole, though ultimately Great Britain would be likely to make a strenuous effort to rid herself of the unwelcome intruders, the chances at present seem very much in favour of the supposed northern hegira. It seems not at all improbable that Brigham Young may contemplate, as is said, a movement upon the Columbia with all his troops, wives, children, cattle, elders, donkeys, sheep, and worldly and spiritual possessions. Whether he starts on his hegira before the troops attack him in the spring, or only afterward, cannot be forseen; though his common sense and prudence may well justify the apprehension that he will adopt the safer and discreeter course.

A few days ago Col. Lehmanowski, the illustrious Pole who served under Napoleon during the times of the Republic and the Empire, died near Hamburg, Clark County Ind., aged 88 years. He was among the first to rally to the standard of the Little Corporal, and never betrayed his trust or his master, from the seige of Toulon to the final overthrow and exile. For his devotedness, he suffered imprisonment, in the loathsome dungeons of Paris, and at last exile. He was buried with Masonic honours, and while he lived could boast of being one of the officers that initiated the great Napoleon into the mysteries of that ancient and honourable order.

Narrow Escape of Sir Colin Campbell.

(From the London Times.)

On some subjects everybody has had his experience. One has had more, another less, but everybody has had some. At the mention of the word chances, for instance, what a quantity of experience could almost everybody recall—what good chances, what ill chances! What a malignity there is in chance! How it can bring about just the most awkward rencontre possible just at the very worst time! How it can just forestall a piece of success, and just knock up a capital plan, just take your friend or coadjutor off whom you wanted, just sprain your ancle, or give you a bad cold when you wanted to run off on your holiday, just give the only bad day in the middle of an uninterrupted three months' sunshine for the Cheddar Cliffs or Dovedale—the only bad week in a whole summer for Loch Lomond or Loch Katrine, and Loch Awe and Loch Fyne—in short, do what of all things in the world is most annoying to you! You may talk of malum propositi, but what is there in design that can equal the malignity of chance! People's tempers give way under its persecution, and excellent Christians become pro tempore Manichæans, and bitterly resent the wrongs which they suffer from this evil deity. On the other hand, how fair is chance when it smiles upon you! There is pleasure in a real piece of good luck, which no successful forethought, no deep-laid scheme's fulfilment, can give.

You feel yourself a favorite of Heaven, and that you have the higher powers of the universe with you. The ancients talked of "Divine chance;" Sylla would not be called wise, but fortunate, and even the great Duke has let out a secret modified worship, which in the recesses of his own mind he paid to this divinity, in motto. We believe that nine people out of ten have more real pleasure in real good luck than in any successful planning; it touches a chord in their breasts; it comes home to them; it is a pure, unsullied source of exhilaration, which sparkles like spring waters from the crystal fount. Gambling is, indeed, only an absurd stupid aus at these clear, transparent honors of chance—an attempt to get possession of them by main force, as if the genuine article, good luck, even on the turf, or at Baden Baden, could be won by design, though something which calls itself by that name sometimes may be. Every gambler would be Mr. So-and-So, "the fortunate." He does not desire so much the thousands themselves, as the privilege of winning them; he pursues Good Fortune, and tries to catch her; he makes a deliberate purpose and trade of the pursuit, and runs systematically at the blissful sensations of good luck—a monstrous perversity, indeed, in morals, and a simple blunder in logic, for what can be a greater incongruity than designed luck! but showing, at the same time, what charms this privilege and gift has for human nature.

We need not say that war is a remarkable and pre-eminent field of chance, and that it exhibits the operation of chance with regard to what is much more important than property and professional distinction—viz., life. Indeed, we should not be far wrong in saying that a great deal of the attraction and insatiable excitement of war is intimately connected with the simple pleasure of chance. That which with men in general goes for nothing, and is taken for granted as the necessary fulcrum for success and advantage of all kinds—life and safety—these become to the soldier, who may lose them, a ground of positive pleasure and self-congratulation. It may be quite true what is said about an army after battle, even a victorious one—that its depressions and low spirits commence just when danger is at last over, and that just when you would expect to find soldiers exulting in the sensations of victory you would almost see them slinking off to their tents, and beginning to droop, and talk low with each other, as if they had suffered a defeat rather than gained a triumph. This may be the case, but the reaction of nature after excitement, and the feeling of sympathy and regret for those who have been taken away, are still compatible with self-gratulation for danger escaped, for safety and preservation. This conscientiousness must, according to the very constitution of our nature, be a source of pleasure; a man may be ever so brave a soldier, but he would not be a man if he had no such feelings. War, then, brings with it to the survivors a constant sense of good luck, and this is doubtless a captivating element in it.

We may congratulate our Indian Commander-in-Chief upon his first taste of this agreeable sensation in the present campaign. The escape is, indeed, picturesque from the very commonness of its features; it gives a vivid insight into the whole field of Indian war, and brings home to us the realities of the scene. Sir Colin Campbell, who, it appears, has persisted, in spite of all the remonstrances of his friends, in travelling like a courier, without an escort, and with only the attendance of his Staff, comes suddenly, on the road between Cawnpore and Lucknow, across some companies of mutineers—infantry and cavalry—probably belonging to the 23d Native Infantry and 12th Light Cavalry. These companies are leisurely crossing the road, the Infantry sitting on elephants, and the horsemen protecting each flank. There does not appear from the description of this sudden rencontre, the slightest doubt that if the mutineer cavalry had at once attacked Sir Colin Campbell's carriage, he and all his Staff must have fallen victims to so overpowering a force. The two parties are so near each other that some of Sir Colin's Staff urge the desperate expedient of immediate attack, as the only apparent way of getting out of the difficulty, and on the principle that English swords may be able to cut their way through any numbers.—But, notwithstanding the closeness of the approach, some "divine chance" seems to have adverted the eyes of the foe, and Sir Colin simply turns his horses' head and retreats ten miles to a European bullock train. "The daring push," says our correspondent, "excites some admiration, but there was more than one life hanging on the Commander-in-Chief's safety. Had the cavalry charged on the carriage, and sabred the inmates, Lucknow might have fallen, for we should not have heard of the fate of the party for weeks."

Here is an insight into the chances of war. At the very outset of the campaign here is almost a miraculous escape of our Commander-in-Chief, not only on a field of battle, where danger, even to a General, is in a certain degree expected, but simply on a journey to the main seat of war. Sir Colin, it is true, does not diminish the hazard by any great caution; he is not a General of the Spanish Field-Marshal type, marching at convenient intervals, and arriving at the field of battle in a coach and six. Yet, how few of those who read the account of this hair-breadth escape in our correspondent's letter will really anticipate ominously for Sir Colin Campbell in consequence, or indulge in gloomy prospects!—The effect will be the very contrary, and one good chance will appear a pledge for another. People are never so much surprised as when they hear of misfortune in war to one who has had a long career of escape, and, whether this feeling is founded on logic or imagination, it is so agreeable an one that we shall on the present occasion indulge it, and trust, till we hear to the contrary, that our Commander-in-Chief bears a charmed life.

Mr. Lovell's Canada Directory.

(From the Montreal Herald.)

We have much pleasure in copying from the Glasgow Argus the following, we will not say flattering but, justly appreciative notice of what may without hyperbole be called Mr. Lovell's magnum opus—a work the local and intrinsic value of which, however great, is far from being its only merit; but to which, the people of Canada, as our Scottish contemporary's article proves, must be largely indebted for affording their fellow-subjects in the British Isles a correct means of estimating the vastness of our country resources and the greatness already achieved by their successful and well-directed enterprise, industry and perseverance in the profitable development of these natural advantages. Our Glasgow contemporary says:—

"To our desk has the Canada Directory, a surprising work. In the spring of the year we took some notice of the prospectus, but we had no idea that the prospectus shadowed such a book as that now before us. Canada was always believed to be a great progressive country, destined at some distant day to hold a prominent place among the nations of the earth. But our conception of that progress has not by a long way come up to that which she has attained. Not a great many years ago, Canada, as a mercantile community, was nowhere,—buried in the forests, surrounded by frozen seas,—a country to be visited only by hardy and venturesome men a few months in the year, for the purchase of her timber and furs. But what do we find now? Her commerce, setting forth to the world, in no mean style, a book of upwards of 1500 pages, telling us of her 1300 cities, towns and villages, with her business men in each; of her ships and steamboats on her inland seas and rivers; of her produce from those rivers and those seas; of the yield of her mighty forests and broad fields; or her traffic with other nations; of her banks, which we see by late papers have stood firm and sure through the panic; of her 1600 miles of railway; of her canals, and her harbors, and wharfs; of her cities and buildings; of her churches and schools; of her benevolent and literary institutions; of her 2,000 clergymen. And then we have also an account of her millions of acres of wild-lands, waiting for the axe and the plough of the emigrant; of her vast mineral treasures, waiting the pick and the shovel of the capitalist; of her unbounded water-power, almost ready for the spindle and the loom of the manufacturer. This Directory, or rather Gazetteer, besides all this, and a great deal more, gives us some information relative to the government of Canada—her laws, her tariffs, and her military. Yes, Canada from this work, is a far greater country than she gets credit for. Speeches, and pamphlets have not told us what this country is, of what she is doing, can do, and must do. Only ten days' sail from us lies this young and vigorous country. Her steamers and her ships come weekly to our shores. Our Queen is her Queen, our flag is her flag, and our language is her language. Our sons guide her commerce, our brothers till her soil, our daughters preside over her forest homes. You who want to see a picture of a young colony stepping forth with manly bearing, worthy of the country from which she has sprung, get a copy of this Directory. The information it gives is invaluable; besides, there is a Map of the Province, by the first engineers of the country, in which every new village, up to September last is laid down. The type and the paper is of Canadian manufacture, and will not be surpassed by any country. The work has been got up with great care, and may be faithfully relied upon. The expense of the undertaking required an outlay of £12,000. We hope the enterprising publisher in Montreal will reap a handsome reward, not only in Canada but in this country also, and be encouraged in the future years to tell us of the progress of the 'brightest gem in Victoria's crown.'"

The Princess Royal's Marriage.

The Zeit (official paper) of Berlin, publishes the arrangements decided on, relative to the journey home of Prince Frederick William of Prussia and the Princess Royal of England, after their marriage. Their Royal Highnesses will embark at London on the 2nd of February, on board the royal yacht, for Antwerp, and will pass the 3rd at the Court of Brussels. They will sleep on the 4th at Cologne, on the 5th at Magdeburg, and will reach Potsdam on the 6th. They will stay at Hanover a few hours. From Potsdam they will proceed to the Chateau of Charlottenburg, whence they will make their solemn entry into Berlin on the 8th.

"The Royal procession will enter the palace by the garden entrance from St. James's Park, to the rear of the palace there will be a large covered corridor, under which the royal party will alight, and along which seats will be provided for privileged spectators. The old-fashioned private entrance for her Majesty will be done away with, and two entrances each of six feet wide, will be made into the vestibule, so that the Queen and her suite will be enabled to enter at the same time. The royal party will then proceed up the private staircase into the royal boudoir, which is being magnificently refitted for the occasion. Instead of the old dingy oak fittings with satin hangings of many years old, the woodwork and ceiling are being painted of a delicate white, picked out with gold borderings. The walls will be covered with one of the richest papers that can be procured. From this room the procession will pass to the throne room, where certain presentations will be made, and from thence the royal party will pass through the state drawing rooms, to the present waiting rooms, more than half of which are to be appropriated for the privileged visitors, for whom raised seats are to be provided, covered with rich red silk damask. From thence the procession will pass through the armory room, in which seats will be provided for the fortunate holders of tickets. On the staircase leading to the area in front of Chapel Royal will be a large gallery erected, capable of holding some 200 persons. This passage and staircase which certainly no one would believe unless he was told such was the case, were in the habit of being trod by royalty are to be entirely renovated. The walls are to be covered with a rich, highly varnished marble paper, and the railings are to be painted a dark blue, picked out richly with gold. From the staircase the royal party will arrive in the open area where the band generally plays. Nearly half the area is being covered over to afford accommodation for some 500 or 600 spectators. The buildings will present a most solid and substantial appearance, and will be hung with drapery and papered, and to the uninitiated would lead to the impression that it formed part of the palace itself. This part of the seats will be appropriated to that portion of the haute noblesse who will not be fortunate enough to obtain the entree into the Chapel itself. This latter building is being entirely renovated. The old high-back sleeping pews are all removed, and from the ground upward seats are being erected, one above the other, so as to afford accommodation to the largest possible number of persons. In addition to this, two substantial galleries have been erected, on the same elevation as the royal pew, which are calculated to hold just 200 persons, supposing that for once in their lives the ladies will consent to leave their hoops at home; at any rate, no great allowance can be made for them, and if ladies find their dresses crushed and spoiled, they will only have themselves to blame. These galleries will be constructed of polished oak, so as to harmonize with the rest of the chapel, and will be relieved with medallions containing the royal arms of England and Prussia. The embrasure opposite the organ will be carried out more than ten feet to accommodate the orchesta, which will comprise the principal artists of English and foreign celebrity, as well as the elite of the boys of Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's, and the chief choirs in the Kingdom. The windows at the back of the altar have been lowered six feet, and will be fitted up with stained glass. The altar will be a magnificent affair, and will consist principally of the richest drapery than can be procured. The ceiling of the Chapel Royal, which is profusely decorated with gold is to be entirely renovated and cleaned. In fact, no expenses is to be spared in rendering the Chapel Royal—which is certainly anything but what it should be, considering that it is the place of worship of the richest kingdom in Christendom, habitually frequented by her Majesty—worthy of the occasion. On the present occasion, however, as far as we could observe, nothing seems to have been overlooked. Two benches are reserved for the representation of the Press, but whether they will be required to attend in court dresses, or will be screened by drapery through which they will be able to peep and witness the gorgeous ceremony, has not yet been determined upon; suffice it to say that on this, as on all other occasions where royalty is concerned, the press will be liberally provided for. As might be expected, the applications for places to view the procession and ceremony have already exceeded by about ten times the amount of accommodation that can be afforded. Seats will be provided for about fifteen hundred persons; and never was Lord Chamberlain or Chief Commissioner of Works made so much of as at the present time. As much interest is being made, especially by the ladies, for a place to view the ceremony or procession as would now, under ordinary circumstances, procure capital official appointments. But both these gentlemen will be obliged to turn a deaf ear to the charmers, as it is impossible to find space for anything like all who, by their position in society, fancy they have a right to be present. As to the Chapel Royal, that will be almost exclusively filled by the suites of the Queen, the Princess Royal, and the bridegroom, and the royal guests who have been invited to this great gathering; suffice it to say that not a nook or a corner where the slightest glimpse could be obtained has been lost sight of, and the Chief Commissioner has designed several galleries from which he believes a sight may be obtained. At the same time it cannot be denied that, considering the occasion, the Palace of St. James is quite unworthy and inadequate. Buckingham Palace, which ought, considering the large sums which have been expended on it, to have afforded ample accommodation, has not a room capable of receiving one-half of the company that have a sort of prescriptive right to attend; and therefore it is that the old and somewhat dingy apartments of St. James's Palace are obliged to be made use of. The wedding will take place on the 25th of January, and will be over before twelve o'clock.

SKETCHES IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—" * * * Meanwhile, the House has assembled. The Speaker has taken the Chair, the mace has been placed on the table, and silence has been called for the reading of the Speech. Although it is supposed that the Commons are present in the Upper House when the speech is delivered by the Queen, this is not really so in fact. There is only room in the bar for about a score of them. So the Speaker reads over the Speech in the Lower House, that all may have an opportunity of hearing it. While he is reading, let us glance at the now occupied benches. There is Palmerston near the centre of the front bench on the left (from the gallery): he has his hat on as usual, and sits cross-legged looking at the ground. The slim, tall, grey-headed man next him, in rather fashionably cut clothes, is Sir George Grey; he has a cold, impassible face, and he will hang you to a certainty if you ever give a chance, without having first made interest with some member of his family. The swellish-looking person who has just sat down on the near side of the Premier, is, his friends will tell you, a gentleman and a scholar; but Lord Derby will tell you in the course of the evening, that he is an ass. He has a habit—has this person—of putting his feet upon the table to admire the fit of his patent leather boots. He yawns a great deal, and frequently looks bored. You judge him by his manner to be a person of consequence. He is in his own opinion, but I doubt if he is in that of other people. You will already, sir, have recognized Mr. Vernon Smith. * * * * And now cast your eyes, as the showman says, on the other side of the House. There you see on the front bench an old gentleman in a yellow waistcoat without any collar. He is a very little man, a very sturdy man, and a very obstinate man, but a very well-informed and sensible man. This is Mr. Henley, the very picture of a hard-headed old-fashioned English squire. What a contrast does his rough bull-terrier-like figure offer to that of the sleek, dandified, young-looking, but not young man, near him. As you see him now, sitting with his profile in view, he reminds you of the portrait of Pitt. But I do not know that Benjamin Disraeli is to be likened to William Pitt in any other respect. Dizzy is not such a dandy as he was. He has left off splendid waistcoats, but there is still some stylishness about his costume. You would not know him by the cork-screw curls now. He cuts them short, and allows them to cluster over his head in Byronic fashion. He seems to have a great deal of face, a great deal of cheek—literally and metaphorically—and a great deal of forehead. He has neither beard nor whiskers, but whether they don't grow, or are regularly shaved off, I am not prepared to say. He is very proud of his hand, which is long, thin and white, and is constantly exposing them to view. He is very fond of drawing it slowly over his polished forehead, when any one is speaking, as if to say—"Dear, dear, what a bore this fellow is, he really makes my head ache." But it is simply habit, a habit arising out of a vain desire to show off his fine hand. You see that little man in a very large hat who has just passed the bar on the left. He is a very shabby, little man, very grey, very pale, but very consequential, and not at all the sort of a person a stranger would expect Lord John Russell to be. But that is Lord John Russell, the once great Whig Parliamentary leader. He is now on the third bench behind the ministers, a monument of what the school history calls, 'blighted ambition.'"—London Letter, Wilts & Gloucester Standard.

Reforms Among the Jews of New York.

A correspondent of the Boston Journal mentions the full swing recent modifications in the religious observances of the New York City Jews, who number, we believe, not far from 30,000:

"The old style of singing, in one or more of the up-town synagogues, has given place to a modern choir, with organ and all the accompaniments. This has been done in the face of the most virulent opposition from the stand old Jews and to the infinite disgust of all who ask for the old paths.—But the innovation does not end with the organ and the choir. The question of the day of worship has of many occasions agitated the Hebrews. Some are uncharitable enough to say, that they cannot afford to lose two days in the week; and as Saturday, their Sabbath, is one of the best days in the week for trade, and Sunday, our Sabbath, is one of the worst, it is proposed to adopt the Sabbath of the Christians. And this latter plan has already been put into practical use by Rev. Dr. Raphael, who on Sunday last preached on the death of the late Judah Touro:

"Touro is the Girard of the Jews, and at the time of his death he distributed his immense wealth among the Hebrews of America, and an annual service is held in commemoration of his beneficence. It was a marked sight to see the synagogue of the Israelites open on the day sacred as that on which the Lord rose from the dead. It may indicate the near approach of the time when those who crucified the Son of the Highest, shall, through their descendants, say, 'Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!'"

EXTRAORDINARY PRESERVATION.

We regret to announce a most fearful catastrophe by fire happening the Sarah Sands transport steamer, on her passage to India from Portsmouth, with the head-quarters and a large portion of the men of the 54th regiment on board, whose preservation and that of the crew may be fairly considered one of the most marvellous on record, as may be inferred from the fact that the ship was burning furiously in a heavy gale of wind 16 hours, the whole of her afterpart being burnt out to a shell.

The Sarah Sands is an iron ship, upwards of 2000 tons burthen, and was formerly employed in running from Liverpool to North America.—She was chartered by the East India Company for the conveyance of troops to India, and on the 16th of August she left Portsmouth for Calcutta, under the command of J. S. Castle, with a portion of the 54th regiment on board, comprising Lieutenant-Colonel Moffat; Captain Lieutenant Thomson, and Gillum; Lieutenants Galbraith, Hughes, and Croupe; Ensign Wood, lieutenant and Adjutant Houston, Surgeon Grant, Assistant-Surgeon Donovan, Quarter-master Hipkin, Paymaster Daniel, 21 sergeants, 15 corporals, 11 drummers, 336 rank and file, 8 women, 7 children, and a number of ladies, relatives of the officers. The voyage appears to have been favourable until the 11th of November, when the ship had reached lat. 14 S., lon. 56 E. (upwards of 400 miles from the Mauritius). About three o'clock in the afternoon of that day the troops who berthed on the after or top deck noticed a smell of burning, which apparently proceeded from beneath them, in the hold. It rapidly increasing, the alarm was given to Captain Castle, who at once ordered the afterhold to be examined, and, to the astonishment, and indeed horror of all, the cargo stowed there proved to be on fire. It was stated that the bulk of the cargo consisted of Government stores. Bale after bale was hauled up in the hope of getting at the seat of the fire, but in a short time the smoke became so dense as to defy any of the crew getting further into the hold, and filling the whole of the cabins with the suffocating effluvia, forced the ladies to seek relief on the quarter-deck. By this time the outbreak became general throughout the ship and as a natural result much alarm was excited. There was no confusion, however, and every order was obeyed by the men with coolness and courage. The course of the ship was stopped. Colonel Moffat was seen in early consultation with Captain Castle deciding upon measures for suppressing the flames, while the crew were actively employed in taking all sail in and bringing the ship before the wind.—Others ran out lengths of hose from the fire-engines, which were passed down to hands below; while hose was put up on the donkey engine. It soon became apparent that all these exertions failed in checking the progress of the fire. Colonel Moffat, at the suggesting of the commander directed his men to at once cast overboard all their ammunition, and in a short time they succeeded in clearing out the starboard magazine. The remainder of the powder in the port magazine, however, excited great apprehensions. Already had the afterpart of the ship become almost impenetrable, from the dense smoke and heat which filled every portion of it. The Colonel appealed to his men for volunteers to attempt to rescue the contents of the magazine now so threatened. Several brave fellows instantly came forward, and heroically succeeded in reaching the magazine and clearing it, with the exception, it is supposed, of one or two barrels. It was truly hazardous work; several nearly lost their lives; having become suffocated with the smoke and heat they fell and when hauled up by ropes to the deck they were senseless. The flames soon afterwards burst up through the deck, and, running along the various cabins, speedily set the whole on fire. There was a heavy gale blowing at the time, and the ship was rolling and pitching. Captain Castle, perceiving the critical position of the ship, at once took measures for the safe lowering of the boats. They were launched without the least accident, and the troops were mustered on deck. There was no rush to the boats, and the men complied with their officers' commands with as much order as on parade. Colonel Moffat informed them that Captain Castle did not dispair of losing the ship, but for their own preservation it had been deemed advisable to keep the boats off so as to act in case of emergency. The ladies, women, and children, were lowered into the port life boat, and she was directed to stand off till further orders. All hands then turned to constructing rafts of spare spars. In a short time three were put together, and which would have been capable of saving a large portion of those on board. Captain Castle succeeded in launching two overboard, and the third was left across the deck to be lowered at a moment's notice. In the meanwhile the flames had made terrible progress. The whole of the cabins, saloon, &c., were one body of fire; and about nine o'clock the flames burst through the upper deck and ignited the mizzen rigging.—Through the forethought of Captain Castle, in bringing the ship before the wind, the fire and smoke were swept sternways, but serious anxiety was felt lest the ship should pay off, and so render her destruction inevitable. Amidst this fearful suspense a dreadful explosion took place, no doubt arising from one or two barrels left in the port magazine, which blew out the port-quarter. All was consternation—the ship, from the main rigging to her stern was in one general body of fire. Captain Castle still had hope, although he expressed his fears to the commanding officer of the troops that the ship would be lost. Providentially the bulkhead of the after part of the ship withstood the action of the flames.—Here all efforts were concentrated to keep her cool. Party after party of the troops volunteered for the work, and so endeavored to prevent the fire making its way forward. As it was several fell senseless from the suffocating influence of the smoke, and were dragged up apparently dead. With the greatest honour to the troops, they obeyed the directions of their officers with a calmness and energy which was almost astounding, and but for which the ship must have perished, and doubtless many of the lives on board with her. For hours did this state of affairs continue. Although the men kept the fire at bay below, it gained the main rigging. Mr. Welch, the chief officer, with several of the soldiers, at once went aloft with wet blankets, and after considerable peril and risk succeeded in extinguishing the flames. As it was, however, one of the yards was destroyed. Towards two o'clock the following morning the men had the satisfaction of seeing the fire diminishing, but it only had the effect of inducing them to continue their exertions with, if possible, almost double energy. The flames were gradually beaten back, and by daylight was accomplished their entire annihilation. It was not till then that the fearful havoc made by the fire was clearly ascertained. The afterpart of the ship was burnt out, nearly its shell remaining; and now another fate threatened her. The gale still prevailed, and the ship was rolling and pitching in a heavy sea, constantly shipping considerable water at the port quarter, which had been blown out by the explosion. She had fifteen feet of water in her hold, and active steps had been taken to prevent her foundering. All the men were set to the pumps and bailing water out of the hold. Captain Castle, fearing the stern would fall out, got two hawsers under her bottom and made them taut; the next difficulty was to stop the water which was placed over the opening, and the leak was partially stopped.—There was abatement in the gale during the morning, and as every hearse of the ship the water tanks in the hold, which had got loose, were dashed from one side to the other. The state of the ship and the continued severity of the weather, rendered the constant working of the pumps and the bailing imperative. It was not till 2 o'clock in the afternoon that the boat containing the women could be got alongside.—They were got on board, and the other boats which had been ordered off during the raging of the fire, returned with the exception of the gig, which had been swamped during the night. The officer in charge of her, however, Mr. Wood, and the hands, were picked up by another boat. During the remainder of the day, the following night, and the succeeding day, the whole of the hands and the troops were engaged in working the pumps and clearing the ship of the water.—By the evening of the 13th the crew succeeded in securing the stern, and getting steerage way on the ship. She had been drifted as far as lon. 13 12 S. Captain Castle then set all sail, and bore up in the hope of making the Mauritius, and to the joy of all on board, made that port in eight days, where her arrival and marvellous escape excited considerable attention. The officers in command of the troops speak in the highest terms of the conduct of Captain Castle during the trying occasion.

By the latest arrival, the headquarters and men of the 54th regiment continue at the Mauritius awaiting the arrival of a ship to take them to their destination.

Quack Tactics.

The extraordinary success of certain quack doctors, and the enormous expense they are able to bear in advertising their merits and their medicines, make honest and reasonable men wonder how the results are reconciled with the expensiveness of the machinery they employ to bring themselves into notice. We do not set ourselves up as more honest than we should like, but this we will not do: for the sake of gain we will not become so low as to assist such scamps as "Doctor Uncas Brant" to make familiar acquaintance with the ailing among our readers. But this we will do: we will put our readers in possession of our means of estimating "Doctor Uncas Brant" and his like. Now it happens that a letter with inclosures, of which we give a copy below, came to us the other day as many of the same have before, which interprets the position of "Doctor Uncas Brant," the philanthropist! and which instead of accepting as an instruction to advertise, is here published as a warning to those fools who read such trash as is cooked up in quack advertisements:—

To the Editor of the Examiner:

NEW YORK ADVERTISING AGENCY,
Office No. 48, Hudson Street,
New York, January 18, 1858.

Dear Sir,—I hand you an advertisement, which please insert at your lowest prices for one year, once a week, and charge to this office. Please send bill with first number of your paper having the advertisement inserted, and state the Commission you will allow me, I presume you will be willing to allow me the usual Commission.—You can draw every six months for amount of bills. I shall continue to send you advertisements from time to time, provided your Commission is satisfactory.

Yours respectfully,
SILAS L. FORCE.

Please mail your paper to the "New York Press," New York, as this will save postage.

The above letter explains the machinery of advertising; the matter to be advertised is "Dr. Morse's Indian Root Pills," and Mr. Force is to have a commission of fifty per cent. on the transactions, and the public who buy the pills get some worthless, intrinsically costless substance, for which they pay enormously, that the publishers of newspapers in which they are advertised may be satisfied, as well as the advertising agent Mr. Silas L. Force.

Next comes "Doctor Uncas Brant." We insert his piece, because it chimes so well with the remark of Mr. Force, when excusing the smallness of allowance for advertising, that the Doctor is a "close" customer, albeit a holy man!

An old Indian Doctor who has made his fortune and retired from business, will spend the remainder of his days in curing that dreadful disease—CONSUMPTION—free of charge; his earnest desire being to communicate to the world his remedies that have proved successful in more than 3,000 cases. He requires each applicant to send him a minute description of the symptoms, with two stamps, (6 cts.) to pay the return letter, in which he will return them his advice prescription, with directions for preparing the medicines, &c.

The Old Doctor hopes that those afflicted will not, no account of delicacy, refrain from consulting him because he makes no charge. His sole object in advertising is to do all the good he can, before he dies. He feels that he is justly celebrated for cure of Consumption, Asthma, Bronchitis, Nervous Affections, Coughs, Colds, &c. Address

DOCT. UNCAS BRANT,
Box 3531, P. O., New York.

To the Editor of the Examiner:

Please insert the above six months, among Spared Notices, if you can do it for $1, net. This is a close customer, but I am desirous of having it inserted. We can do better on future advertisements. If I notice this advertisement in your paper, I shall credit you with amount.

S. L. FORCE, New York.

But some will say, the dear old Doctor only charges six cents, and cannot make anything. Now we will explain how he gets along. A poor suffering patient, or a friend, writes to the Doctor; the Doctor answers in such a manner as to make further correspondence necessary, either by prescribing medicines that are not known by the names he attaches to them, or such as he knows they cannot obtain without his intervention. The applicant writes again, his hopes being excited by the confidence of the Doctor in a cure, if his remedies are applied in time, and that time the applicant is informed that upon his sending a sum of money, say twenty dollars, the medicine will be forwarded by express; and as a larger quantity is sent than his case needs, because of the manner and distance of its carriage, there will be a balance unused which can be sold to the local medicine vender. And now as we have given all we know about the thing done and the manner of doing it, we leave "Doctor Uncas Brant" to make his way with publishers who, being as ragabondish as himself, will receive his favours and ask no questions. For our part we desire these rascals to understand that our columns cannot be used for the purpose of imposing on ignorance.

The Good Templar's Soiree.

The celebration of the first anniversary of this Institution took place on Tuesday evening last, in the School Room attached to the Methodist Church. The meeting was well attended, and the refreshments provided were unexceptionable. Dr. Lovell took the Chair, and Mr. Wm. Johnston read the yearly report, which was very encouraging. Mr. Thos. White, Jr., spoke at great length, and among other interesting statements, he announced that the Temperance body had discovered the error of insisting on an immediate prohibitory enactment by the Legislature, and that they intended for the future to take lower ground; their tactics would be confined to the arts of moral suasion, when, if they succeeded in their conversions to the principles of the Temperance Society, they hoped, with the new forces, to make a more vigorous assault upon the rum shops. Rev. Mr. Roger followed in the same key; he contended that the prospects of a general onslaught upon the liquor sellers had become much weaker by the ill-advised attempts hitherto made by the Temperance movement to force their peculiar tenets upon the community at large. Mr. Roger recommended them to keep their ulterior intentions more out of sight; they would thus gather strength and at the proper season, secure the triumph of their principles. It was regretted by the Chairman that so few speakers had appeared to take part in the proceedings, the absence of some was accounted for by previous engagement, and of others by family affliction; he called upon the meeting for volunteer speeches. Mr. John Robinson accepted the invitation, and delivered himself of an original description of his own fall and happy restoration; the first he attributed to the temptations of the devil, concealed under the blandishments of a jolly good fellow; and his revival he accredited entirely to the influence of the Temperance body, but for whose timely and friendly assistance he would not then be in existence. Mr. Robinson made a very successful effort towards gaining the ear of his audience. He was practical, and hit the right vein, by picturing to the meeting, in himself, the great good that is to be wrought by an earnest application of the principles of the Temperance Society to the outer world. After Mr. Robinson, Mr. Sawers was called upon, though, as the Chairman said in giving effect to the will of the meeting, it was not altogether in order, since Mr. Sawers wanted the qualification to become entitled to a stand on the platform, by the advocacy of total abstinence principles.—Mr. Sawers very briefly thanked the meeting for their condescension in recognizing his presence among them, and assuring them of his high respect, and the great pleasure with which he heard they did not contemplate making Prohibition any longer a political question, retired. Excellent singing enlivened the evening at intervals, and at 10 o'clock the Soiree broke up.

Mr. Henthorn's Case.

By the last Review the public are informed that Mr. Henthorn has been charged by Mr. Cumming with taking plank, the property of the Town, and clandestinely appropriating it to his own use. The manner of the publication is by a letter, proceeding from Mr. Henthorn, and containing affidavits which go to show that Mr. Henthorn bought plank from Mr. Ledgate and Mr. Bird; all of which might be perfectly consistent with the guilt he says is charged against him by Mr. Cumming. This is now fully shown by the letter of Mr. Cumming, published in this paper today, and as the matter is to be investigated by the Council, we abstain from remarks. For Mr. Henthorn's sake, however, we do hope there has been some misunderstanding, since, if as a Councillor and member of the Committee on public property, he could do such things, it will not only reflect seriously upon his moral character, but create an impression that other Councillors have not always given their valuable services for nothing. Now that Mr. Henthorn is connected with the Council, he can be of great service to the community, if he would give the result of his experience while he was connected with that body. The hints he throws out in his letter assure us that he will assist in correcting the abuses that have grown up in the Council.

Brotherly Affection.

In the reign of Queen Anne, a soldier belonging to the marching regiment which was quartered in the City of Worcester, was taken up for desertion, and, being tried by a Court martial, was sentenced to be shot. The Colonel and Lieutenant Colonel being at the time in London, the command of the regiment descended to the Major, a most cruel and inhuman man. The day on which the deserter was to be executed having arrived, the regiment as is usual on such occasions, was drawn out to see the execution.

It is the custom on these occasions to draw lots from the several corporals for this disagreeable office; and when every one expected to see these lots as usual, they were surprised to find that the Major had given orders that the prisoner should die by the hands of his own brother, who was only a private in the same company, and who, when the cruel order arrived, was taking leave of his unhappy brother, and with tears fast-flowing, that expressed the anguish of his soul, was hanging for the last time about his neck.

On his knees did the poor fellow beg that he might not have a hand in his brother's death; and the poor prisoner, forgetting for the moment his petitions to Heaven, begged to die by any hands than those of his brother. The unrelenting officer, however, could by no means be prevailed on to revoke his cruel sentence, though entreated to do so by every officer in the regiment; on the contrary, he swore that the brother, and he only, should be the executioner, if it were only for example's sake, to make justice appear more terrible. When much time had been wasted in fruitless endeavors to soften the rigor of this inhuman sentence, the prisoner prepared to die, and the brother to be the executioner.

The major, strict to the maxim of cruelty, stands close to see that the piece was properly loaded; which being done, he directs that the third motion of his cane shall be the signal to fire. Accordingly, at the third motion, the Major, instead of the prisoner, received the bullet through his own head, and fell lifeless to the ground.

The man no sooner discharged the piece, than throwing it on the ground he exclaimed:

"He that can give no mercy, no mercy let him receive. Now, I submit; I had rather die this hour for that man's death, than live a thousand years and take away the life of my brother.

No one seemed to be sorry for this unexpected justice on the inhuman Major, and the man being ordered into custody, many gentlemen present, who had been witnesses to the whole affair, joined to entreat the officers to defer the execution of the other brother till the Queen's pleasure would be known.

The request being complied with, the City Chamber that very night drew up a feeling and pathetic address to her Majesty, setting forth the unparalleled cruelty of the deceased officer, and humbly entreated her Majesty's pardon for both brothers. The brothers were pardoned and discharged from the army.

Progress of Siberia.

From the London Times.

At the close of last year postal stations had been erected all along the whole line of the Amoor, from Stralotschnaia to Nicolaieff, in which latter place the tinkling of the bell on the post telega was heard for the first time in November of last year, when General Kagakewisch passed through there with certain officers of his staff to an inspection of troops at Marinisk. In that same month an American ship, the "Europa," arrived at Nicolaieff (the military station at the mouth of the Amoor, not to be confounded with the Nicolaieff, or shipbuilding arsenal on the river Bogg), having on board two iron steamers in pieces, which were put together in that town during the winter, and were named after two rivers in Siberia, Amoor and Lena. The former was 66-horsepower, the latter 35, and draws only 3½ feet water, so that she can ascend the Amoor as far as Ust-Strelotschnaia. To these two have been added two other steamers from a building yard at Schilka. On the first trip up the stream in July last the "Lena" conveyed passengers and goods in 30 days up as far as Ust-Strelotschnaia, the point of confluence of the two rivers which subsequently bear the name of Amoor; but it was confidently trusted that when they were more familiar with the navigation of the stream they would accomplish the trip in considerably less time. We hear of the Amoor steamer being in September 2, at the mouth of the Zega, a tributary of the Amoor, unable to proceed further up for want of water, and having on board 4,350 sable skins, varying in value from 6 to 9 silver roubles (a real sable for 18s to 27s,) and fourteen grey fox skins at 15 silver roubles a-piece. In Nicholaieff there had arrived up to July 18, two vessels from Boston, two from Hong Kong, and two from San Francisco, with goods to the value of 382,000 silver roubles; some Japanese vessels were also expected. In Ajan there had entered five vessels, and six had cleared out. The prices of all sorts of goods, which formerly had been excessively high in Nicholaieff, had sunk very much in consequence of the ample supplies brought by these vessels; for instance, sugar fetched only nine silver roubles per pood 40 lbs, while in Irkutsk the same quantity costs 14 silver roubles. The importers had, therefore, lost but little time in sending their goods up the river, and making a harvest of the high prices there. A letter from Irkutsk, August 27, states that two new towns in that district, Werchnolensk and Balagnask, had been inaugurated this year. Irkutsk itself was expanding rapidly, and gaining in life and wealth from the constant passage through of large numbers of military to join the army in the Transbaikal territory and on the Amoor; inns and cafes, with strongly developed Western comforts, were described as having been thus brought into existence. It is remarkable that no letter or other source of information from Irkutsk gives one any intelligence of what has become of the ecclesiastical mission that arrived there July last on its way to Pekin to relieve the members of the mission that had served their time there; it would seem most probable that the same difficulties that prevented Admiral Putiatin from approaching Pekin from the land side have interfered with the project of the so-called "ecclesiastics."—The communications reported from Kiachta show that the unsettled state of things in China has exercised an unfavorable action on the amount of trade done there in ten this year; the quantities that have changed hands there amount to 130,000 chests, a larger number than was sold last year. It is possible that the apprehension of a still worse state of things may have driven some stocks into this market which would otherwise have been withheld or offered elsewhere. In Nishni-Novgorod an extensive conflagration had destroyed all the buildings in which the well-known fair is always held; it was impossible for the inhabitants of the town to make the smallest attempt at saving anything, inasmuch as the river Oka, which separates the town from the site of the fair, was so covered with ice floating down the stream that all crossing was impossible. A report which has been sent in to the government from Gurien, the last of the military posts on the Ural, dilates at some length on the numerous mines of gold, silver, copper, lead and coal that are already opened in the Siberian districts occupied by the Kirghises a portion of which, 600 square versts, is being exploited by the Russian house Popow, and according to the statements made in this report, if all or if only a portion of them be true, there is a large source of wealth contained in the bowels of the earth and waiting to be brought to the light of day in that part of Russia. One of the best proofs of the reality of the riches of Siberia is to be found in the fact that among the numerous political exiles transported to that part of the world, and who by the recent amnesties were permitted to return to their own country, many preferred to remain in that inhospitable land, not only because it had in the long term of their banishment become a second home to them, while their original home was become strange to them, but because they found themselves there in the best way to acquire riches, &c. Numerous instances were adduced of exiles already in possession of 5,000 silver roubles, saved from the profits of their agriculture, hunting, fishing, commerce, or mechanical skill. One named Pulewski was even a large shareholder in copper works on the Altai, had established the steam navigation on the Ob and Irtisch, and was a part proprietor of several steamers. To each exile who was desirous of availing himself of the amnesty to return home 150 silver roubles were allowed as travelling expenses.

From the New York Times.

In the matter of the application of George Taylor.—It is said that a certain Mrs. Hawley, in her early days, eloped with a certain Mr. Hawley. They lived together for some time, and a son and a daughter were born unto them. Subsequently Mrs. Hawley obtained a divorce from her husband, and married a Mr. Wright, who is now deceased. Mr. Hawley, the first husband, who is also not living, previously to his decease made a will leaving to his son and daughter some $30,000 each. With these two children, the widow Wright has been residing in Thirteenth-street.

Some four or five years ago, a Mr. George Taylor made the acquaintance of Miss Emma A. Hawley, daughter of her who is now Mrs Wright. He became quite intimate in the family, and was cordially received by mother and children. A few months since, for reasons not material to be stated, Mrs. Wright became opposed to the proposed union, and determined that it should not be consummated. She kept a strict watch upon the young lovers, not allowing them to leave the house together. It is supposed that George and Emma planned various schemes for an elopement, but all were frustrated by her watchfulness. Last Saturday a party was formed to visit Wallack's Theatre. Mr. Taylor and Mr. Hawley, Jr., were to go together. Emma, a gentleman who was in her pint, and Mrs. Wright with another gentleman, were the rest of the party. They rode down in an omnibus, and when they got out Emma and her friend managed to slip behind the rest, and, in the crowd about the door, to escape unperceived. They hailed a hack, and hastily jumped in, drove to private house, No. — Ninth-street, where they had previously provided a clergyman, who had been brought from New Jersey, and kept there for two days to be in readiness at any time to marry the lovers. At the theatre, when our party had obtained good seats in the body of the house, the eager eye of the mother sought in vain for her daughter. Mr. Taylor was also surprised at her absence, but ascribed it to unintentional separation in the crowd. He thought they might be up stairs, and consented to hunt up the lost ones. He left the party, but instead of going to the gallery, proceeded as rapidly as possible (and that was decidedly fast) to the house in Ninth-street. * * * * *

In about ten minutes a merry party left the house in Ninth-street and proceeded to Wallack's where they took their seat in the gallery. They had been seated but a few moments when Mr Hawley (having been sent to search after Mr Taylor, the lost hunter after Miss Hawley,) came up. The party was glad to see him, and as their seats were not very comfortable, concluded to join their friends below, whither they went, and after sundry wondering how they could have got separated, gave their attention to the "Poor of New York." Nor did the mother once suspect the other play they had acted. But "Murder will out." During the ride home the mother made some inquiries suggested by her suspicions, but the answers were evasive.

On Sunday her fears were so aroused that she refused to allow Mr. Taylor to see her daughter. On Monday, Mr. Taylor acknowledged that they had been married, and demanded to see his wife, but being still refused he took out a writ of habeas corpus to obtain her. On going to the house to serve the writ, he found that the mother had fled to parts unknown, taking the new wife with her. The writ was returnable on Tuesday, but no trace of the fugitives could be found, and the writ became void. On Wednesday Mr. Taylor was going to the store of Mr. Hawley when he saw a carriage start from the door. Thinking he might learn the whereabouts of his wife he followed, until the carriage stopped in front of the Attorney of Mrs. Wright. Being near Judge Sutherland's office Mr. Taylor ran in and quickly returned with a writ of habeas corpus. Opening the carriage door he discovered his mother-in-law, to whom he politely presented the writ. She objected to receiving it; but it was pressed upon her in such a decided manner, that it would have been rude for her to decline accepting it. The writ was returned yesterday, and the counsel appeared and put in the return, in substance giving the above facts. The further hearing was postponed until 3 p.m. to-day. The parties most interested are our authority for saying that the husband is about 23 and the lady 17 years of age.

DESTRUCTION OF A SCHOOL-HOUSE BY FIRE.

SEVEN CHILDREN SUFFOCATED AND SEVERAL INJURED.

A shocking calamity occurred in Brooklyn, on Tuesday, involving the loss of the lives of seven children attending public school No. 14, at the corner of Concord and Navy streets, Brooklyn, opposite the City Park. A fire broke out in the female department about two o'clock, and soon extended over the entire building, causing a panic among the children, who rushed one over the other to save themselves.

The fire was first discovered in the primary department by Miss Bebee, one of the teachers, who informed the Principal, Miss Voorhies.—They were just about dismissing the school, without informing the children of the cause, when a little girl cried out "Fire!" and thereupon a rush was made, pell-mell, one over the other; but the teachers, who retained their presence of mind, used the utmost exertions to get them out safely. In this, they happily succeeded. They all rushed to the main entrance, and every one of the girls, so far as could be ascertained last night, got into the street in safety.

The entire school numbers about eight hundred children, the greater proportion being boys. The boys' department was on the Navy street side, and here the catastrophe occurred. As soon as it was known that the house was on fire a panic occurred, and all rushed for the stairs leading to the door below. The stairs became choked up. Some fell down and others fell over them, while a great pressure was kept up from the top landing. Mr. Wolcott, the Principal of the school, threw himself over the banisters and handed out the boys to men standing below as fast as he could do so. They were then conducted into the street. A number of the larger boys acted bravely in this emergency. They handed the smaller boys to the Principal who stood on the lower landing, whose the greatest pressure was, and he handed them to those below him.

The crowd above was so great that it was utterly impossible for any one from outside to get up to render any aid, and all the assistance that could be given was rendered by these boys.—The names of some of these brave lads are as follows: James McFael, Smith C. Keef, John J. Bray and William Mackay. There were others, whose names could not be ascertained, equally entitled to credit.

The children killed were all suffocated upon the lower landing—not one was burned. The unfortunates are all between six and ten years of age.

So far as heard from only one child is injured that is yet alive, and that had its legs broken.—Name not ascertained.

The parents of children who attended the school ran about from place to place in the wildest state of excitement. The women particularly were frantic. Four children, three of whom were dead and the other dying were in Dr. Stout's drug store. The parents came rushing in there, and if they identified any of the bodies, gave vent to their feeling, and clasping the lifeless forms in their arms, hurried out into the streets. Others who did not identify any of them there, went out and hunted about the neighbourhood until they were satisfied that their children were not killed. It is utterly impossible to describe the state of excitement that existed.

The news of the catastrophe spread far and wide in a short time, and people came flocking from every direction, among them a number of physicians, who rendered all the assistance in their power to relieve those of the little sufferers who were still alive.

The teachers of the school (all ladies with the exception of the principal, Mr. C. W. Wolcott,) are deserving of great praise for their presence of mind under the disheartening circumstances. All stood firm and every child was got out of the building before any of them left. Miss L. French of the primary department acted heroically. She stood by one of the second story windows and dropped the children out to the men below, who caught them in their arms. By this means a great many were saved. The others acted in a like creditable manner.

Alarming Military Emeutes in Dublin.

During the past three nights (says the Freeman's Journal of Monday) the centre of the western end of the city, at both sides of the river, has been kept in a state of excitement and terror by bands of soldiery belonging to the several regiments now in garrison, who seem to have thrown off all restraint, and to be totally indifferent to the laws of military discipline. Since Christmas night the thoroughfares in the neighbourhood of the Royal Barracks have been the scene of the most desperate encounters between soldiers of the Grenadier Guards and of the 30th and 55th Regiments. These disgraceful affrays commenced in a public house in Queen Street, where the men had been drinking, and it seems that some offensive expressions were used by some of the guards towards the men of the 30th, when a general melee ensued, the combatants fighting with their cross-belts. After a long encounter, and after some terrible wounds had been inflicted on both sides, the guards, though superior in numbers, were beaten out into the street, amid shouts of victory from the 30th and 55th, who, after the expulsion of their grenadier opponents, went back and kept possession of the public house. In the meantime the guards, having been reinforced by soldiers of their own regiment and of the Shropshire militia, went back to the house and renewed the combat.—Another desperate fight with cross-belts, tables and chairs, pints and tumblers, took place, and the guards had again to retreat, closely followed by the 30th and 55th. The fight was then resumed on the quay, and ended in the guards retreating, some of them leaving their shakos behind, which were paraded by the successful party as trophies of victory. Stones were thrown in all directions, and the glass in several windows was broken. At this time a picquet of the 30th regiment arrived, and for a time put an end to the quarrel. The rioters mauled on and while passing three stones and smashed several windows in Silver Street and Flood St. A strong detachment of the grenadier guards, and of the 30th regiment under the command of General Gascoigne, were drawn up in West Liffey Street, who succeeded in getting all the refractory soldiers into barracks at about half-past nine o'clock. On Saturday evening, a picquet of the grenadier guards, followed by a number of other soldiers of the same regiment, issued out of the barracks, and proceeded down Pembroke Quay and Aarran Quay; and as they went along, shouting and hallooing, they met six privates of the 30th, and gave them a very rough handling. The six contrived to make off, hotly pursued by the guards, and one of the 30th, being rather hard pressed, took shelter in the china-ware shop of Mr. Clarke, Queen Street, into which place they followed him, smashing all before them, and having caught the fugitive they beat him most unmercifully.—We understand that the bad feeling existing between the soldiers of the Guards and the 30th and 55th Regiments was made apparent yesterday in the Royal Barracks by several acts of riot and insubordination, and we could learn that to such a height was the violence of the soldiers carried, that the Commander of the forces had to be sent for, and that he had to leave Chapel Royal, where he was attending service, and proceeded to the barracks for the purpose of directing such measures to be taken as would restore order and discipline amongst the troops. Notwithstanding the precautions taken, some of the soldiers of the 30th and 55th regiments were even more riotous and disorderly last night than on the two previous nights. They proceeded along Aaran Quay, at about seven o'clock, followed by a crowd of idlers. The soldiers kept shouting out for the Guards or the militia to come and meet them, and as they moved along the line of quays, they threw stones and broke several windows. The soldiers went over to the south side of the river in search of guardsmen, and failing to come in contact with any, went in a body to Chancery lane police station, with the avowed purpose of releasing prisoners that might be confined there. Inspector Fitzpatrick, a policeman on reserve duty, and one prisoner who was sitting by the fire, were the only persons in the station. Inspector Fitzpatrick, when he saw them coming, armed himself with a sword, and gave one to the Policeman and another to the prisoner, and by threatening to cut down the first man who would attempt to force his way into the station house, he succeeded in keeping the soldiers at bay until a party of police came to his assistance. About eight o'clock the crowds dispersed, and the soldiers returned to their barracks. We learn that the 30th regiment is ordered to be in readiness to leave Dublin in the course of this day and to-morrow.

(From the London Free Press.)

One of the most disgusting cases of the above nature that has come under our notice for years, has recently occurred at St. Thomas, County of Elgin. From information that we have received, it appears that a Mrs. Patten, a resident of the Town, died on the 30th of December last, and was interred in the Cemetery connected with St. Thomas, on the 1st January. The burial took place in the usual manner, and the friends of the deceased entrusted to the sexton the duty of filling the grave, which, it is believed, was faithfully performed. On Friday last, the 15th inst., it was discovered that the grave of the deceased lady had been robbed and her remains removed. Instant enquiries were set on foot, and after considerable difficulties, with the help of a search warrant, her mingled remains were discovered by her afflicted relatives in a room used as an Orange Lodge in St. Thomas. A coroner's jury was speedily impannelled, and an inquest held, when the Coroner bound Sparling, a shoemaker, and a Dr. Caughel over to appear before the magistrates on Tuesday last, to answer the charge. An investigation was accordingly held at which Judge Hughes assisted. For want of conclusive evidence the case was adjourned till Monday next. The inquiry, however, left no doubt that the grave had been robbed by Sparling or others, for surgical purposes, but it did not show so far, that Dr. Caughel was cognizant, when he received the remains how they had been obtained. The body, it seems, was first placed in another room in the same building in which the Orange Lodge was situated, and was removed to the Lodge room for better concealment. Sparling being Master of the Lodge, and having in custody the key of the room, must have been privy to the disgusting outrage. It is said that he will be expelled from the Orange society for his insult to the order for appropriating their lodge room to the infamous purpose for which it was used. Immense excitement in St. Thomas has resulted in consequence of this discovery, and a strict watch is to be kept on the cemetery in future. The body of Mrs. Patten was re-interred on Tuesday, a large concourse of people forming the funeral procession. We learn that the remains of the lady had been used for the purpose of anatomical demonstration to a considerable extent by Dr. Caughel and his pupils, although the doctor professes entire ignorance of the crime by which the body was provided for dissection. Some clue may now possibly be had to the guilty parties who attempted a similar outrage in the English Cemetery in this city a few weeks since, to the great grief of the family of the unfortunate deceased. We hope the scoundrels, whoever they are, will be brought to justice, and be punished with the utmost rigour of the law. We are not aware whether Dr. Caughel, who has rendered himself so notorious in the affair, intends setting up a separate school of anatomy, but it is curious that he has four pupils, one a shoemaker, another a tailor, a third a carpenter, while the fourth is a clerk in a dry goods store! We believe the inhabitants of St. Thomas intend making an example of this case to the terror of all evil-doers. Certainly the crime which we have above recorded is one of the most shameful outrages that could be perpetrated in a civilized community, and no excuses of a surgical nature can palliate such ruffianism. If the graves of our parents, our brothers, our sisters, and our friends are not to be protected from the fiendish clutch of the midnight marauding body-snatcher, then our boasted civilization is a humbug, and the protection by living in social communities a myth.

The King and Queen of Delhi.

A private letter, dated Delhi Palace, Nov. 16, in the Times says:—

"We have seen the captive King and royal family; they are in ruinous little rooms in one of the gates of the Palace. The old King looks very frail, and has a blank fixed eye, as one on whom life is fast closing. He, certainly, is too old to be responsible for anything that has been done. With his sons much more guilt may lie, some have been shot, as yet must have really some are yet untaken. The youngest son we saw looking like 15, they say 18, bold and coarse to look at. He is the only child of the Queen. With her some of our ladies have had a long interview. They found her seated on a common charpoy, (bedstead,) dressed in white cotton clothes with a few and very trifling ornaments—all her grand things have been taken from her. She is described as short and stout, about 30 years of age, with a round, animated face, not at all pretty, but having very pretty little hands and feet. She was sitting betel-nut to eat with her pawn. Some 20 females, relatives and menials, surrounding her. She professes the utmost horror of the 3d Cavalry, to whom she traces all her misfortunes. She says the King was helpless to control them, and that when their arrival had placed Delhi in rebellion against us, they were as ready to rob her as any one else. She says the mutineers did rob the palace, and that all her jewels were only saved by being buried. She does not seem to blame us for their present captivity; she understands the necessity for enquiring into guilty or innocent parties, but she did not seem to assert the King's innocence as much as her own. She said he had been in the hands of bad people. There appeared to be a frightful rivalry among the women: it is said she criminated the sons of former wives, she being the last. Her sister is represented as being much better looking than herself, and has a daughter of thirteen married to the King's youngest son, already mentioned, and reputed very beautiful. Our ladies describe her as having superb large eyes, and a most beautiful little mouth, but her face otherwise too flat and full. Some of the women told them they had English women and children in the palace after the massacre, in hope of preserving them, but the mutineers demanded them and could not be resisted. They say the Sepoys complained that the King was feeding English-women daintily, while he only gave them grain food.

Purchasing Commissions in Army.

From the London Times.

In the Report upon the system of Purchase in the Army presented by the minority of the Commission charged with the inquiry will be found a very striking and pregnant argument. Where did our military system break down in the Crimea?—Not in the discipline, organization, or efficiency of particular regiments—for in this respect our army, by common consent, was inferior to none—but in those departments on which the aggregate force depended for direction and sustenance. Now, as in these departments no purchase is admitted, it follows plainly that the purchase system cannot be charged with the result, nor can it be assumed that the abolition of that system would make matters any better than they were before. "We entertain a strong conviction," says the report "that if selection for the Staff is judiciously exercised and the general regulations strictly adhered to, that no officer shall be permitted to remain on the Staff beyond the limited term of five years, the complaints of which so much has been heard lately of the inefficiency of our military system will receive their best and most satisfactory answer."—Without entering afresh into the purchase branch of the question we can introduce our readers to the reforms proposed as regards education and selection for the Staff.

The old "Senior Department" at Sandhurst is to be converted into a "Staff College," which will receive at first, 30 students from the several divisions of the army in due proportion. Every candidate for admission must have seen not less than three years' service, have passed, if a subaltern the ordinary examination for a Captain's rank, be qualified, physically and morally, for active Staff duty, and bring certificates to this effect. These conditions being satisfied, a competitive examination will decide the rest, and determine which of the candidates shall be admitted to the Staff College. After admission a specified course of study will be pursued for two years, accompanied in each year by two examinations, one held in the summer and another in the winter.—The former will be conducted by the Professors of the College; the latter, which will include the final tests, by independent examiners. The result of these final tests will be a class list, in which the names of the candidates will be arranged in three classes, according to merit.

Of the subjects of study we shall say nothing at present beyond remarking upon the very significant introduction of the Hindostanee language into the catalogue, but one or two other points are of material importance, as affecting the probable action of the system. No payment whatever will be exacted from the students toward the funds of the College. No commanding officer is to refuse to forward the application of an officer for admission; and, if he declines to support it by his own recommendation, he is to make a distinct report of the grounds on which he acts. When the system comes into full operation there will be a "final" examination, or an examination followed by a class-list, once every year, and this will be conducted by independent examiners. It will be competent, moreover, for any officer, on giving proof of the requisite qualifications, to enter the College for one year only, or, if he should be still more confident in his own powers, he may, with the sanction of the Commander-in-Chief, dispense altogether with residence or study at the institution, and present himself at any of the final examinations to compete for a place in the class list with the regular students of the College. In the case of officers serving abroad the examinations will be conducted under the superintendence of a Board appointed by the General in command—the same questions as those proposed at home being sent out for answers.

As far as these provisions extend it cannot be denied that they promise to insure a good amount of efficiency in the Staff of the Army, and a fair field for honourable ambition. Neither patronage nor money is needed to open Staff employment to any officer of industry and merit. His entrance to the College, depends upon his performance at a competitive examination, his studies there will cost him nothing, and his acquirements there will be put durably on record. If he chooses he may propose himself for approval without even quitting his regiment, and may employ the spare time which most officers possess in qualifying himself for more distinguished service.—Even his own commanding officer cannot impede his advancement by any prejudice or caprice, but must either add his own recommendation or give plain reason for withholding it. As to the course of study or standard of attainment proposed, it may we hope, be taken for granted that they will fulfil all the conditions generally desirable.

Here, then, we have a good machinery up to a certain point, that is to say, a certain number of officers will be turned out every year well qualified for Staff employ, and selected on such principles as will exclude anything like favor or patronage. But, now, what is to be the process of passing these qualified and approved candidates from the class list to actual appointments on the Staff? Simply this, that in two years' time Staff appointments will be almost, but not quite, confined to such applicants. It is expected that the College will open with its first batch of students in February next, and consequently the completion of a full course would run out a list of qualified officers at the beginning of 1860. From that date, with certain exceptions, no officer will be appointed to the Staff who shall not have gone through the College or passed the final examination. The exceptions embrace, first, officers who at that date shall have attained the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel; and, secondly, officers of proved ability in the field. To the latter proviso not a word of objection can be offered, for the proof assumed is clearly the most complete of all proofs. The best examination in the world can only make it probable that a candidate will display "ability in the field," and if this has been actually displayed no other evidence can be wanting. "Ability in the field" is the very aim and object of all the studies referred to; if an officer possesses this qualification, and shows as much, any further inquiry is altogether superfluous.—The same, however, is not to be said of the other exception, which would amount simply to this,—that where officers are of a certain standing qualification exacted from their juniors may in their cases be dispensed with. Perhaps it is unreasonable to suppose either that officers of the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel should go to school again, or that, failing this condescension, they should be inexorably excluded from Staff employment; but it will at once be seen how much importance, with reference to this point, may attach to the observation of the Purchase System Commissioners respecting the limitation of Staff service.

For ourselves, however, we are disposed to believe that if a competent class of officers is once produced by a good system of study, and, what is of still greater consequence, a public record of qualifications, it will be next to impossible that bad appointments should be made. The Staff College will ultimately give the tone to the system and regulate the general standard of capacity. It should be observed, too, that the objections occasionally urged against book learning and examinations as introductions to public officers are by no means applicable to the proposed tests for Staff officers. Possibly a young man may make a very good clerk in the Treasury without knowing much Latin or much political geography, but he certainly cannot make a good Staff officer without knowing French and mathematics, and would evidently be all the better for some knowledge of military administration and the natural sciences. Service on the Staff is both distinguished and desirable. It gives excitement and variety instead of monotony and routine; it insures greater opportunities for the display of talent, and greater chances of promotion; it implies superior ability and receives larger pay. To these advantages no objection can be taken, for they naturally pertain to the duties discharged, but it is of the utmost consequence both to the efficiency of the Army and the fair claims of its officers generally, that such advantages should be earned by merit and not conferred by favour.

Earthquake at Naples.

From the Times' Correspondent.

NAPLES, Dec. 19.

On Wednesday evening, I was sitting in a salon in our residence on the Chiatamone, situate on the immediate shore of the Bay, when one of our servants rushed into the room to know what was the matter, supposing that we had knocked violently at the door of the room. Immediately the windows and doors began to rattle in the strangest manner. Imagining that it might proceed from one of those sudden coups de vent so frequent in this climate, I opened the windows and walked out on the balcony. The atmosphere was still, the most profound calm prevailed, not a cloud could be seen. It was a splendid starlight night. I returned into the salon, and in a few seconds felt the floor alternately sinking and rising and affected like that of the cabin of a vessel when she rolls and pitches. In the next room, where two young ladies had just gone to bed, I heard that they found it difficult to keep in bed. The maid who attended them said the walls were falling. I looked at a large bronze chandelier suspended from the centre of the ceiling of the salon, and, to my astonishment, saw it swinging exactly like a lamp suspended in the cabin of a vessel in a storm. The character of the phenomenon was no longer doubtful. I looked at my watch. The hour was a quarter past ten exactly. As the most exact means of ascertaining the undulation, I observed the movement of the large chandelier. This is a large bronze lustre, weighing 400 lbs or 500 lbs. The distance from its point of suspension to the lowest point of its axis is about 10 feet. Its motion at first seemed to be that of a pendulum, the arc of vibration of the lowest point being about two feet, but this immediately changed to the motion of a conical pendulum; the lowest point of the axis described a circle, or rather an ellipse, the major axis of which was about two feet. It appears, therefore, that the phenomenon began with a tremulous movement of the foundation of the house, manifested by the rattling of the doors and windows, and that this, after a short interval, was succeeded by undulations, propagated, as it would seem, by the conical swing of the lustre, in two different directions. All that I have been taken so many lines to describe took place within two, or at the most three minutes. Of course, the lustre, once thrown into a state of oscillation, continued to swing for a much more considerable time.

Such being what I witnessed personally, I ascertained afterwards that similar phenomena were presented in other apartments in the hotel. The swinging of the lustres was even greater, but this arose no doubt from the circumstance of their being smaller and their line of suspension shorter. The bells of the hotel were all set a-ringing. The pendulum of a large house-clock standing in the hall rattled against the clock case. A gentleman lying asleep upon a sofa on the ground floor was flung off upon the floor.

A man-servant of ours occupied a neighbouring apartment with his wife and two children. The bed of one of the children was overturned, and a lamp standing on the table was thrown on the floor. The population generally, soon after the shock, went out into the squares, places, and other open spaces. The wealthier classes ordered out their carriages, in which they passed the chief part of the night in driving on Chiaja road, which runs along the borders of the Bay, wide enough to keep clear of falling houses. The people who filled the squares and other open spaces lighted fires and passed the night around them. Many families had chairs and benches brought from their apartments into the Piazza Reale, the Largo de Castello, the Santa Lucia, and other like places, where they went during the night awaiting a recurrence of the shocks.

In some houses the thin partitions which divide room from room and the ceilings were cracked; some damage is also said to have been done to the British Hospital.

On the night succeeding the phenomenon (Thursday) the population, imagining that a repetition of the shocks might be expected about the same hour, crowded again into the squares, where they passed part of the night.

At the Royal observatory on the Capo di Monte two astronomical clocks, the pendulums of which vibrate in the plane of the prime vertical (that is, east and west), were stopped. Other clocks in the observatory, however, continued to go regularly. The employees of the observatory estimated the continuance of the first shock to be 5, and that of the second 25 seconds. They considered the direction of the undulations to be from south to north. They perceived two other slight shocks at 3 and 5 o'clock on the morning of Thursday.

A few particulars of the disasters in Calabria are given in the official journal. The visitation is undoubtedly far more grave than is admitted. It appears that the telegraphic wire has been broken between Eboli and Sala, both in the line of country I have indicated. News, however, has been received from the latter place, where the walls of the prison and barracks have been cracked; three persons were killed. At Atessa, a town near Sala, half the houses are reduced to ruins. In Padula, another town in that district, more than 100 houses have been thrown down, with an unknown number of persons buried under them. In La Polla, another town of that neighborhood, the disasters have been enormous and the victims numerous, but unascertained; among them, however, is included a brigade of gendarmerie. In Auletta, Petrosa, and Caggiano ruin and death have occurred to an unknown extent. In Salerno many buildings, including two churches, the intendant's palace, and the barracks of the gendarmerie, are gravely damaged. Near Salerno a church and belfry have fallen, killing two ladies. In Campagna numerous houses are cracked, including that of the Superintendent.

In the Basilicata at Pelenza the disasters have been extensive. Numerous buildings have been thrown down burrying unknown numbers beneath the ruins. A broken telegraphic despatch from Barl and and Campo Basso has excited great alarm, as it would appear to signify that all the inhabitants of one of those places have been destroyed.

State of Affairs at Delhi.

EXECUTIONS OF PRINCES AND PRINCESSES.

Bombay (Dec. 4) Correspondence of London Post.

You will observe that a great deal is being said by the press of India regarding the treatment conceded to the King of Delhi and his sons by British officers. This behaviour is certainly most repugnant to an Englishman's feelings, and the press calls loudly for the suppression of it. It would seem that something has at last been done at Delhi in the way of dealing out retribution on the leaders of the rebellion—24 of the inferior members of the royal family were executed on the 18th ult., under a sentence of a military commission before which they were tried. I hope this is only a beginning, and that such good work will go on.

Large quantities of prize property have been seized at Delhi, consisting of magnificent jewelry, precious stones, shawls, kincobs and other valuables, which it is thought will be sent down to Calcutta for sale as soon as the roads are safe. That which has hitherto been disposed of at Delhi consisted of articles of but trifling value.

We have other victories to announce besides those at Lucknow. On the 16th ult. a force from Delhi, under Colonel Gerrard, attacked the mutineers of the Jodhpore Legion, reinforced by refugees and rebels to about five thousand men, with nine guns, at Narnoul, about eighty miles southwest of Delhi, and completely defeated them, capturing all their guns. Our loss was 15 killed and 45 wounded. Among the former we are sorry to say was Colonel Gerrard, the only officer who fell.

We extract the following from the Friend of India:—

The King of Delhi's life was spared, it would appear, by order of General Wilson, who also acted in obedience to command. Elsewhere he says that Lieutenant Hodson had no option in the matter of the King of Delhi.

In connection with this matter of the culpable leniency displayed towards the King of Delhi and his family, we may revert to a curious statement made by the Hurkaru so far back as the 22d May last, on the strength of accounts from Agra—where, as we have reason to believe, our contemporary's authority should be good—to the effect that "the King of Delhi's son was in the station, staying with Mr. Muir," the object of his visit being "to show that his family are in no way connected with the outbreak." In the prevailing excitement of the time this curious statement escaped notice, or perhaps was refused credit; but now, coupled with the fact that the excessive "clemency" exhibited towards the royal traitors and murderers is ascribed to the influence of the late Lieutenant Governor, the assertion acquires wonderful significance. We have not seen in the official correspondence, as published in the blue book, any intimation of this alleged visit, and it seems incredible that it should have taken place without being mentioned to the Governor General, with whom Mr. Colvin was in daily communication. On May 14, the late Lieutenant Governor, in a telegraphic message to his lordship, said:—"We have authentic intelligence in a letter from the King, that the town and fort of Delhi and his own person are in the hands of the insurgent regiments of the place which joined about 100 of the troops from Meerut, and opened the gates." Hence it is certain that the King was in communication with Mr. Colvin, and he might have succeeded in persuading him that he had no concern in the outbreak. Mr. Colvin may, upon this, have issued instructions respecting the treatment which his Majesty was to receive on falling into the hands of our forces; but we can hardly believe that he remained undeceived to the last, and left those orders in force, or that even, if he was so deluded, General Wilson would for a moment regard such orders so long after Mr. Colvin's death, or allow himself to be in any way hampered by them.

The Friend of India adds:—

We would call the attention of the government of India to the state of things existing in the city of Delhi. It demands instant and stern reform. We are certain that the freaks there committed have no sanction from the Governor General, and if the message costs £10,000 in bribes, written orders should be transmitted peremptorily forbidding them. The youngest son of the King, eighteen years of age, has been declared innocent on account of his youth, and rides through Delhi on an elephant with two British officers behind him to do him honor. The statement appears so incredible that it may be set aside as a mere newspaper report. We entreat government to believe that it is one which we would not publish without such information as produces absolute certainty. The King, also, it is said—but for this we have only the authority of the Lahore Chronicle—has a retinue to attend him. It is things such as these, the honors paid to our murderers, which exasperate Europeans to frenzy. They are not ordered or sanctioned by government, but they should be stopped by court martial, if necessary.

A charge brought against Col. Hogge, with reference to his public appearance in Delhi with the son of the King of Delhi, has produced the following letter from him, addressed to the Lahore Chronicle:—

Although I do not notice statements made by anonymous correspondents in newspapers, yet, as you have given my name in one of the editorials of your paper of the 14th of November, as one of the officers who had been seen riding with one of the sons of the King on an elephant through the streets of Delhi, I send you for publication the following statement of the facts, leaving the truth of your charge "lacquying the King's son about the streets of Delhi" to the judgment of your readers, especially of those who know me. Having been asked to accompany the commissioner on a visit to the King, I went, along with several officers, one of them holding high official rank in the army, to the house where he was confined. Before leaving, Jumma Bukt, a son of the king, apparently a lad about 15 or 16 years of age, asked the commissioner if he might be permitted to go out occasionally for an airing along with any gentleman who would take him, and as I was in the habit of going out every evening on an elephant, the commissioner asked if I should mind occasionally calling for him. I replied if there were no other objections, I would do so, and as both the commissioner and the officer before alluded to appeared to think there could be none, I consented to call for him, and accordingly, on two occasions, I took Jumma Bukt out; the first time having nothing but a pad on the elephant, and being rather afraid that he might try and escape, I put him in front to prevent him slipping off, the second time having a "chanjamah," I sat in front, though I must say I considered it a matter of very little moment which seat I occupied. As to parading through the streets of the city, the first time I went out through the Cashmere gate to Ludlow Castle, and home when it was quite dusk through the Lahore gate and Chandnee Chowk; the second time I passed up the Chandnee Chowk, and returned by the Lall Khon street, having been induced to go there by Jumma Bukt, expressing a wish to shew me the house he lived in. Without entering into the question of his guilt or innocence, but presuming that, if guilty, he would never have been allowed to accompany a British officer in public, I can only say that I found him a very intelligent lad; he gave me a good deal of information about the mutineers, their leaders, and their plans, and had I remained longer at Delhi I should probably have taken him out oftener, but having returned to Meerut on the 26th October, I had no further opportunity.

An English journal gives the following account of a recent funeral procession witnessed at Hong Kong. There is a sound of gongs and a precipitation of small crackers at the north end of the hand, and the coolies are leaving their works to look on. It is a burial procession. The mother of a Chinese opium broker is going to her last home. She carries with her all her little comforts and necessities which were to begin life in the next. Many palan

ELLIS'S PATENT ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or most situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second, Its BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth Its DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth, It can be supplied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MO

Fugitive Slaves in an English Court.

From the London Times.

A report appeared a few days ago respecting two remarkably good-looking colored girls, who were brought to the Southwark Court by police constable 85 M, charged with soliciting alms in Blackman street, Borough.

It appears that they were dressed very neatly in light colored clothing, such as is usually worn by female slaves in the Southern States of America, and walked by the side of the kerb, the elder sister carrying a placard in front of her on which was written "Fugitive Slaves from America," and the younger carried a money-box in which was a shilling in copper money. When before the magistrate, they in the most artless manner stated they were fugitive slaves, having last Fall escaped from a plantation in Kentucky, and found their way to Philadelphia, in the free State of Pennsylvania. They were then sent to Greenock by some benevolent person, with the view of getting into some sort of service. Being unable to obtain employment there, they came to London, and, faring no better, they had resort to an appeal to the kindness of the English people. They then told Mr. Burcham that they most likely could gain a livelihood if they had the means for purchasing wool for the knitting caps and gloves, which they had frequently done in America. Mr. Burcham then, believing that there might be some truth in their story, granted them a trifle from the poor-box to enable them to buy some wool, when they left the Court, expressing their gratitude. Since then his Worship had received several small sums from benevolent individuals for their use, and yesterday afternoon, they attended for the purpose of showing their small stock of knitted caps which they had been enabled to make up through the kindness of his Worship.

Mr. Burcham told them since they were before him on the last occasion he had not only received several small sums for their use, but letters from various persons, some of whom were of high distinction, offering to take care of them and place them in comfortable situations. He also received an anonymous letter which did not speak very highly of their characters, so he thought it might be necessary to make some inquiries about them before he answered the letters of those who were waiting to assist them. He inquired where they now resided.

The elder girl said that they had removed from Bishopsgate street to the house of Mr. Smith, No. 19 Wentworth street, Whitechapel.

Mr. Edwin (Chief Clerk) informed his Worship that Wentworth street was full of low lodging houses similar to the Mint in this district.

Mr. Burcham (to the girl).—Do you know Crown court, Wentworth street?

Girl—Yes, sir. We lodge in a house there at the back of No. 101. We have a room there, and pay half a crown a week for it.

Mr. Burcham—Does any one else live with you?

Girl—Oh no, sir.

Mr. Burcham—Have you a father and mother in England?

Girl—No, sir. My parents were slaves, and one of them died about eighteen months ago. We were about to be parted and sold, when, by the kindness of some persons we were enabled to escape to a Free State.

Mr. Burcham—Is there a colored man living in the same court, but has a wife and large family?

Yes, sir.

We have knitted some caps and sold some, and what remains of our stock you can inspect.

Mr. Burcham examined their small stock of knitted caps, which they had carefully placed in a box, and asked whether they had sold many.

Eldest Girl—We have sold several, sir, and these are all we have left. We have not sold one to-day.

Mr. Burcham—Do you know the name of the vessel you came from America in?

Mr. Burcham—Who defrayed the expenses of your passage to Greenock?

Girl—Some free colored persons in Philadelphia, sir.

Mr. Burcham told them that an officer of the Mendicity Society had promised to make inquiries respecting them, but he had failed to attend before him to make his report. However, they appeared to have made an attempt to obtain their own livelihood by industry, therefore he hoped that their story was true. Under those circumstances he should order them to be paid 5s. out of the benevolent contributions to enable them to go on for a few days. On Monday next they might call again, when, if their story proved correct, no doubt they would be taken care of.

Merchants and Clerks in Montreal.

At a meeting of the retail dry goods Merchants of this city, held on Tuesday evening, the following resolutions were unanimously passed:

Resolved,—That from and after the first day of April next the retail dry goods Merchants of this city engage all new hands at the rate of so much per annum, without specifying any term of engagement; but that with reference to all hands at present in each of our respective stores, it is optional to engage them by the term or not.

Resolved,—That the retail dry goods Merchants do hereby agree not to engage any young man who has been employed in this city, without enquiry being previously made of their former employer; and that any communication made by their employer shall be considered to be strictly confidential.

At a meeting of the Clerks and Shopmen, held in this city, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

First,—Resolved—That the Clerks engaged in the trade of this city having learned with regret that some of the merchants of Montreal are engaged in the formation a league against the interests of the clerks of which the principal object is to limit the engagements of those employed by them to hirelings from month to month.

Second,—That experience has shown that the mode now followed of hiring by the year has sufficiently protected the interests of both the merchants and the clerks employed by them, and that the proposed change will have the effect of reducing the clerks to an abject servitude—will expose them to destitution of employment during the dull season of the year, and moreover will leave them defenceless to the caprice and ill-will of the merchants.

Third,—That as it will be not only derogatory to the respect which the clerks owe to themselves, but will also compromise their material welfare to consent to such monthly engagements;—The members of this assembly solemnly pledge themselves to remain without employment rather than accept the conditions sought to be imposed on them.

Fourth,—That in order to carry out these resolutions, and to organize a system of mutual protection, the members of this assembly constitute themselves into a permanent association, and that a Committee be named to draft a constitution based on the present resolutions, and to report as soon as possible.

Upon these the Advertiser remarks:

Assuming that it is correct that an organization such as the clerks accuse their employers of has been initiated here we think the course they are pursuing a very unwise one. They have but to refer to the history of strikes in other countries to learn that in all combinations of labour against capital, even when made for self-preservation, labour has gone to the wall. No good and much evil may come of this one, by irritating those whom a less aggressive course would have turned from persistance in a system which would operate to the damage of those employed by them.

We do not believe that the traders of any city at this day, dare combine to wrong those dependent on them, without receiving from public opinion a prompt and impressive rebuke; and least of all could such a course be pursued with impunity here.

In electing war in preference to reason and negociation, the clerks have placed themselves beyond the application of that public sympathy and assistance to which an otherwise good cause would have entitled them.

A retail clerk is, of all men, the most utterly helpless when deprived of the ordinary employment which requires from him the outward appearance of a gentleman, which encourages the tastes and habits of ranks far above him, while it rewards him with a stipend which a common laborer would scorn. How are such to contend against employers who can either starve them into submission, or drive them from the field altogether by supplying the places of the insurgents with an equal number of lads eager to gird on the scissors and grasp the yard wand in the service of the fair.

We do not think the counter-irritant applied in this instance will effect a cure of the ill complained of; and we would caution these young men to take new counsel in this matter before proceeding further, and opening a breach which will be hard to stop. Let the public have a calm statement of the facts as they stand, of the extent of the alleged combination among employers, of the reasons which the clerks have to urge against it, and we have no doubt that justice and right will be done without the necessity of a contest between weakness and strength, the only result of which must be failure to those to whom it may be ruin too.

Most Extraordinary Case.

A WOMAN LIVING OVER EIGHTEEN MONTHS WITHOUT EATING OR DRINKING.

Relative to the case of the woman, Mrs. Hayes, of the town of Day, Warren County, of whom it is said that she has lived near nineteen months without a morsel of food, and whose death was recently announced in one of the papers of Albany, the Sandy Hill Herald has the following:—

Mrs. Hayes is not dead, but remains in the condition in which she has been for many months past.

Incredible as it may seem, there is little, if any doubt, but that this woman has lived for more than eighteen months without eating or drinking. We have not alluded to the case before for the reason of its apparent incredibility; but scientific gentlemen, together with hundreds of others, after the closest scrutiny, have become convinced that there is no deception practised, and that the woman actually subsisted without food or water.

In order to test the matter, a gentleman took the woman to his residence, and parties watched her day and night for one month, who say that she neither ate nor drank during that time, and that on food being introduced in the room, concealed in the pockets of disinterested persons, the woman would go into horrible convulsions. The same effect was produced by persons taking tobacco, or any kind of ardent spirits where she was.

The woman is reduced to a perfect skeleton, so much so that by placing the hand upon the abdomen, the backbone can be distinctly felt.

We are aware that there are instances on record somewhat akin to this, which turned out to be frauds, but if this is a deception it has been so adroitly practised that every one who has examined it has been duped. Besides there is no motive for the deception; and it is quite incredible that any person would suffer to the extent that this woman has, for the sole purpose of playing upon the credulity of the public.

Viewed in any light, the subject is worthy of the attention of the scientific and curious.

From a later source we learn that Mrs. Hayes has expired. It is stated that she remained insensible for 15 months of the period, and up to a few days of her death, when she seemed to revive, and spoke occasionally. After her death her body was opened, and a snake five feet long and half an inch thick was taken from her stomach. It was alive when removed, but died soon afterwards.

Boston Expedition to Sevastopol

(From the Boston Transcript.)

We are requested to correct a statement made in a communication signed "W," in our issue of the 5th inst., asserting that the vessels sent to the Black Sea by the Boston Relief and Submarine Company had left Sevastopol, having abandoned the enterprise as unprofitable. This, and the reports to the same effect, which have been going the rounds of the papers, purporting to have been copied from a French journal, turn out to be mere fabrications, without the slightest foundation in fact.

Official advices were received by the last steamer from Mr. Lee, commander of said expedition, dated Dec. 3, by which it appears that the submarine work at Sevastopol was progressing energetically and profitably under his supervision, and that no thought of abandonment had been entertained.

These false reports may have arisen from the fact that one of the vessels of the expedition (the Silver Key) had been despatched to Constantinople for coals and provisions; but she had just returned to Sevastopol, laden with supplies—making the passage back in four days, beating the whole way against head winds and a very rough sea. An imperial firman or license had been promised by the Turkish Government, and would be forwarded by the next mail to Mr. Lee, through the American Legation, authorizing the Boston Company to recover sunken property anywhere in Turkish waters—which is to be undertaken after its work at Sevastopol shall have been concluded. This contract is considered of great value, as eight of the finest ships in the Turkish navy were deliberately sunk at Sinope in the early part of the Russian war to prevent their falling into the hands of the Russians.

There is also a line-of-battle ship sunk at Eupatoria in only five fathoms of water, and other valuable wrecks at various points on the Turkish coast.

The Gwynne pumping engine has been thoroughly tested at Sevastopol, and found to work perfectly in deep water, and an 84 gun ship had been got nearly ready for raising, but owing to the sudden setting in of cold and stormy weather it was found necessary to postpone further operations upon her and other ships till Spring, but no doubt exists of final success.

In the mean time an immense amount of chains, anchors, rigging, and munitions of war was being obtained by the divers, which it is believed will give the expedition ample and profitable occupation during the Winter. The officers and men were in fine health and spirits, and had generally performed their arduous duties in an energetic, faithful and satisfactory manner.

Mercantile Espionage.

An idea of the extent to which the system of Espionage into commercial transactions is carried in the United States and Canada, may be gathered from the articles which we (Leader) reproduce from a Montreal cotemporary. With its head-quarters at New York, this mercantile agency, as it is called, spreads like a network over the United States and Canada, having its agents in every city and town, whose business it is to report the standing of every mercantile man of any importance, especially if he has large foreign connections and credits.—From the very nature of the case, much of the information thus furnished must be of a more or less dubious character. As a general thing it must be impossible for the agents of this company to have access to the books of the different establishments, respecting which they profess to give information. They must be guided to a great extent by outside appearance and rumours. These indications may indeed not be wholly unreliable in all cases; but there must be thousands of instances in which they could not be accepted as conveying a true accurate, much less a precise state of the facts. An agency of this nature is of that mixed character which is probably capable of producing an equal amount of good and evil. It will serve a good purpose in so far as it prevents dishonest and irresponsible men from obtaining credit, which they could not or might not be disposed to make good. It must produce mischievous effects in so far as the information given may be inaccurate, unfairly biased, or prejudiced by some cause or another. This kind of espionage may be necessary; but if so, it is a dangerous necessity. Much depends, doubtless, upon the kind of agents employed; and it must frequently happen, indeed generally, that those capable of giving accurate information, would be either biased by self-interest, or refuse to impart the knowledge in their possession. Recourse must, therefore, from the necessity of the case, be frequently had to agents who are by no means the best qualified to give the information required. A great liability to error must, from this cause, exist, and in proportion as the information circulated by these agencies is unreliable, it is injurious. One of the chief objects of our Montreal cotemporary appears to be, to show the favourable position of that city, as regards the soundness of its merchants, in comparison with other cities in Canada and the United States. There can be no doubt, we believe, that Montreal has passed through the crisis with less injury than most other cities in Canada or the United States.

From the Montreal Herald.

We are indebted to Mr. Hall the obliging manager of Messrs. Douglas & Co.'s Montreal office, for a copy of this interesting, and we believe reliable resume of the commercial history of the past year in the United States and British Provinces of North America. Did our limits admit, we should have been glad to have given our mercantile readers the benefit of all the valuable information contained in it, but that not being in our power, we must confine our extracts to such of its features as appear to us most likely to interest Canadian readers.

Before doing so, however, it may not be amiss for us to say a few words in explanation of the nature of the business carried on by the firm, of whose summary of commercial events we are about to avail ourselves; more particularly as we are inclined to believe its value to the commercial community is, as yet, but very partially understood and appreciated, at least in Canada. The principal object, then, of Messrs. D. & Co.'s enterprise—established in New York in 1841—is to obtain and furnish to the merchants and others, their subscribers, full and reliable information as to the property, character and responsibility of all parties engaged in trade throughout the entire continent of North America. Their "Agency" is, in short, a vast, and we may add from our own personal investigation of it, a most admirably organized system of espionage into the circumstances, habits and general trustworthiness of every man engaged in trade, and, consequently, either giving or taking credit in the United States and British Provinces.

It is, in fact, a self-constituted, but none the less efficient, system of secret commercial politics, for the protection of the honest, capable and prudent Merchant against the practices of the dishonest, incapable and imprudent. On the other hand it cannot be disguised that, supposing such an "Agency" to have merited and secured the general public confidence, the powers which its conductors possess might, either from incorrect information or from interested or malicious motives, be exercised or abused to the discredit and injury of really respectable and trustworthy traders. Nor can we shut our eyes to the fact that the possession of power is always dangerous to the morality of its possessor, when his own interest is involved; and that it would not be easy to conceive any more effectual machinery for the levying of what is called "black mail" from the commercial community than is supposed by an "Agency," such as we are describing—the weak, the timid, and above all the designing (which, we fear, would include no inconsiderable proportion in every community,) would be sure and large subscribers. It should be borne in mind, however, that the extent of evil, which arises from the abuse of any human institution—the courts of law, the orders and ordinances of religion, the public press, for examples,—is generally fairly proportionate to the extent of good arising from its use; and that, measurably at all events, the public opinion, which bestows the power, also supplies the check upon its misapplication. While, then, as we see and point out the drawback to this, to us at least, novel system of collecting and distributing "useful knowledge," we equally recognize its merits and appreciate the valuable assistance which, if worked by upright, capable and discreet men, it cannot fail to afford to every wholesale merchant in the regulation of his credits. We may mention that the position which Messrs. Douglass & Co. held towards the subscribers to their "Agency," is that of confidential employes; and that each subscriber, if he reveal to any other party the information obtained from them, does so on his own responsibility—legal as well as moral. We would merely add that the great and undeniable success of Messrs. Douglass & Co.'s enterprise in the United States—they have now, besides their gigantic head-quarters in New York, associate and branch offices in every large city in the Union—affords a satisfactory guarantee of their able management and of the growing faith of the commercial community in the practical advantage of their system.

With these general remarks on the "Mercantile Agency" business, we proceed to give our readers, from Messrs. Douglass & Co.'s annual circular, some idea of the vast extent of their field of operations and of the amount of business, with its general results, therein transacted during the past year.

There are, then, according to Messrs D. Co., 157,394 village and country stores in the United States, who are at all times indebted to the city sellers—merchants, manufacturers, and jobbers—in an aggregate sum of $2,282,000,000 or, on an average, in $14,500 each. Such is the enormous amount of credit, to protect and regulate which, Messrs. D. & Co.'s machinery of intelligence was projected and is kept in operation. The mercantile firms in the United States (exclusive of California, and of the class of small retailers in the larger cities) are given at 204,061, which, estimating the population at 25,000,000, gives one store to every 123 souls, or, say, to every 25 families. Of the business done by country traders, during the past year, we have the following calculation,—the "circular" says:—

If the country storekeepers' general debt is, as herein before estimated, $2,282,000,000, it would be fair to infer that ordinarily the year's business would amount to all of double that sum, or 4,564,000,000. For this we would deduct for light trade last Spring, and the injury to sales this Fall, 40 per cent., which would make the business for 1857 with the country merchants, amount to $2,738,400,00, and as the losses for the year by this trade were $41,228,000, the per centage is about one and a half.

There has been lost by 537 swindling and absconding debtors, $5,292,000 and by 515 firms which will pay nothing, their losses and liabilities thus absorbing everything, $39,309,003. There are 3,287 concerns owing $121,910,000, and they are such pieces as usually average 40 to 50 cents; and there are 439 houses owing $77,189,000, which will pay in full if the times ahead prove to be ordinarily prosperous.

The total of the liabilities of 5,123 failures is put down at	$239,694,000
But there will be realized, from those who will pay in full	$77,189,000
And on the amount of "ordinary" failures $197,000,000 at 40 cents	78,832,000
	156,021,000
Leaving a final loss of	$83,483,000

We do not find that Messrs. D. & Co., give any estimate of the whole amount of business of the United States, on which, it is calculated, the above sum, of $83,750,000, will ultimately be lost; but we are told that the city failures, during the year, have been 2,352 in number, and the liabilities of the same $257,963,000, or an average of about $109,000 each. Of these failures, from Dec. 25, 1856, to Dec. 25, 1857, in 26 cities of the Union, to which are added Canada East and West, and the other British Provinces, we have an elaborate statistical table, from which, as an example, we give the portions devoted to our own city and to Toronto.

In Montreal there are stated to have been 909 stores, failures 15; liabilities, $323,000; average failures of former years 12; liabilities $445,000; of these failures, ¾ have arranged with their creditors, on an average of 52 cents in the dollar; swindling and absconding debtors 2; liabilities $8,000; of debtors not classed as dishonest, but who will pay nothing, it would appear, there has not been one in our community last year; and of those likely to pay in full, one is given, his liabilities amounting to $70,000.

In Toronto 389 stores are given; failures 23; liabilities $2,714,000; average failures of former years 17, liabilities $1,270,000; of these failures, three have arranged with their creditors, on an average of 58 cents in the dollar; swindling and absconding debtors 2, liabilities $153,000; of debtors not classed dishonest, but who will pay nothing 3, liabilities $17,000; likely to pay in full ¼, liabilities $1274,000.

If Messrs. D. & Co's figures are reliable, and we have no reason to doubt at least their approximate correctness, the contrast which they afford between the results of the trade in Montreal and Toronto during the past year, is assuredly but little creditable to our western friends and customers; while, whether as compared with Toronto or with any one city in the neighbouring Union, Montreal displays a soundness and solidity of which her citizens may well feel proud. Even the proverbially "solid men of Boston" cut but a flimsy figure this year, when compared with our Canuck Montrealers; while the high-flyers of New York, having thrown all their ballast overboard, lie stranded in crowds on the barren shores of bankruptcy.

The aggregate liabilities of the failures of the year in New York is $135,129,000; in Boston $41,011,000; in Montreal $523,000; while our population may be taken at one-tenth that of New York and Brooklyn, and at a fourth that of Boston. We admit of course, that population affords but a very imperfect test by which to estimate the amount of business transacted, and consequently the proportionate losses, which might fairly be expected to result from it; but freely admitting that the business done in New York and Boston during the past year, probably largely exceeded in proportion to the population of these cities, the amount done in Montreal, in proportion to hers; t ere must still, we think, be left a very broad margin of congratulation on our part, in view of the annual balance of losses in the three cities, given by Messrs. Douglass and Co. That this satisfactory state of things is largely due to the prudence and foresight of our merchants, it would be most unjust to deny; but it would be equally unjust to refuse that credit to the wise and liberal management of our banking institutions, to which, measurably, may be attributed our escape from the very disastrous consequences entailed upon the merchants of New York and Boston, from the directly opposite course pursued by theirs. On this important subject of the banking system among our neighbours, and of its disastrous influence in producing and aggravating the monetary disturbances of the past half year, Messrs. Douglass and Co. thus speak, and with this quotation we shall close our notice of their annual circular—they say:

"We entertain the common opinion, that the action of the officers of four or five of our strongest banks was the chief cause of the great disasters of the season. They concerted together, and forced a rapid and merciless contraction upon all our city banks, carrying along with them the use of the whole country. If the banks of New York City are to control the action of the banks of the United States, it is to be regretted that so small a number of them should be able, by combining, to determine the line of policy to be pursued by the whole body. The whole country is therefore interested that New York should have a steady and safe banking system; and if our Legislature should impose such restriction as the press generally have recommended, like the law of Louisiana, requiring them to have one dollar in specie for every three of liability, we should have as perfect a system probably, of paper currency, as has ever been devised. If the control of our banks is trusted to unskilled hands, the system ought not to be blamed for the difficulties which their mismanagement has caused. All wise action on the part of the banks would have driven into insolvency all that class whose condition warranted such treatment without putting one on the rack, in order to discover the weakness of the few.

REACTION OF CONGRESS.

From the New York Herald, Jan. 21.

We have been waiting patiently for Congress to get through with its usual number of Buncombe speeches, with the hope that it would then go to work and attend to the interests of this country at large. But we fear we shall have to wait in vain for such a consummation, unless members of Congress can be convinced that the country—the whole country—does not lie entirely within the boundary lines of their own districts.

Civil war virtually exists within our borders, yet Congress, though having been in session over one month, has taken no steps towards strengthening the executive arm for its suppression. The country will hold Congress responsible in this matter, for the administration can do nothing until money and men are voted. The President, the Secretary of War, and Gen. Scott, have all strongly urged the necessity of additional troops, not only for the suppression of the Mormon rebellion, but for the better protection of our extensive frontier; but the only response has been a few more speeches on "bleeding Kansas" and a few more tirades against the government for the annihilation of filibustering in Central America. A settling day will come for these unfaithful servants, and that before long. For the purpose of thwarting the administration, there are men in Congress who are willing to allow civil war to run riot in our midst, and to permit thousands of our gallant soldiers to perish amidst the snows of the Rocky Mountains. Such men should be held to a strict accountability.

As we have on more than one occasion stated, this Mormon rebellion should be nipped in the bud and the difficulties in Utah settled in one campaign. Humanity and economy demand this, and can only be accomplished by the most prompt and active measures. Already the season is so far advanced that it will require almost herculean efforts on the part of the different departments of the army to procure the necessary supplies, and to start them across the Plains from Fort Leavenworth by the time grass commences to grow in the spring. One week's delay now may defeat the whole expedition, and we are disposed to place responsibility where it belongs. As to the talk that the Mormons will not resist—that they will move off during the winter—it is idle and puerile. Have they shown any disposition yet not to fight and to resist to the utmost? On the contrary, have they not shown by word and deed that they intended to meet us in a death struggle? The speeches of their leaders in the Bowery breathe nothing, but war, and that to the knife, and the acts of the people in the field, in burning trains and stampeding cattle, show that the leaders are supported with energy and fidelity.

We have heard that Brigham and his fanatical followers were more likely to leave the country and seek more peaceful homes, than to remain in Utah and wage a fruitless war with the government; but we have no assurance that such will be the case, and it would be the height of folly to predicate any action or want of action on such a contingency. Measures should be taken as if we were convinced the Mormons intended to remain in Utah and fight it out, and that on a scale that will insure complete success in one campaign. It is better for us to terminate these difficulties in one year, at a cost of fifteen millions, than to continue them for three or four years at an expense of forty or fifty millions.

Already General Scott has issued orders for three regiments and two batteries—all the disposable force of the army, to start early in the spring to reinforce Colonel Johnston's command. Nominally this is an increase to the army for Utah of 2,500 men, but in reality only some 1,700 or 1,800, a force totally inadequate to the duty to be performed. It will require nearly all this increase to guard the trains.—We should have a force in Utah of at least 10,000, any smaller number it would be useless to send. Not that it will require this number to force the passes and penetrate to Salt Lake Valley—2,000 of our men could sweep every Mormon battlefield; but it is to guard securely the supply trains, and then to have a sufficient active force to follow the Mormons to their mountain fastnesses.

We think, in this view, that Congress should at once add to the regular army the additional regiments asked for by the Secretary at War; and also, if necessary, call out a couple of regiments of mounted volunteers. The army is too small—leaving Utah out of the question—to protect our frontiers. One of the largest items of expenditure now arises from the necessity of transporting troops from one quarter of the country to another, as their services are required; and we presume that enough is spent annually in this manner to support one or two additional regiments. Let Congress raise these regiments, and let the administration promote the field officers from the army, which we are assured will be done, and we will have an army that we may rely upon in any emergency. As we have stated, the administration has done all in this matter that lies in its power. The rest remains with others.

Brigham Young remarks that "he holds the key of the continent;" it is our duty to wrest it from him; and to do this Congress must place the necessary means at the disposal of the Executive; failing which, the country will hold unfaithful servants to a strict accountability.

Interior of China.

The intelligent special correspondent of the London Times, now in China, while awaiting the dilatory march of military and political events which were expected to follow the movements of the powerful armaments lately sent to that country, and to result from the anticipated negotiations by Lord Elgin, employed his leisure in gathering by diligent and well-directed inquiries, at sources which have been rarely reached by travellers, a mass of valuable information of the actual condition of that vast empire, particularly in regard to its commercial resources, and the practicability of laying it open to a remunerating trade with England. A letter from Shanghai, as late as October 17, just published, presents a great variety of information bearing upon the subject, which is well deserving of attention. We have not room at present for a satisfactory synopsis of the article.

The following extract, however, confirming of the closing portion of the article, and adverting an important accident to our geographical knowledge, of this country, will have a personal, independently of the information with the reasoning of the writer on the main subject treated by him, and we copy it without hazarding any material diminution of the reader's interest in it, from its being severed from the rest of the article. It will be perceived that the objects with which this geographical view of an almost newly discovered region of country is here presented by the writer, it is shown that the realization of any great benefits from the China trade must depend upon the success of the negotiations about to be attempted for opening the inland region to foreign intercourse:

"At present, however, you are only upon the outer fringe of the great Chinese Empire. You might have made more of your sphere of action than you have made, but you are not trading with China.

All our ports, except Shanghai, are separated from the inland waters of China by a chain of mountains. A continuation of the Himalayas, at a much lower altitude, tracks the whole coast line of China to the Archipelago of Chusan.

The seaboard provinces, extending southwards from Ningpo to Canton are thus isolated from the interior, and from the great inland routes of traffic by the barrier of mountains. Over these mountains goods transmitted from the interior to any of these ports must be carried. Even in passing from Ningpo to Hangchow there must be two transhipments of goods. Amoy and Foochow have the same position.—Canton labors under the same disadvantages. Every piece of merchandize brought down or carried up to the interior must be carried for 20 miles over a chain of mountains, and carried on men's backs. But, then, Canton has been fostered by its monopoly of intercourse, a race of carrying Coolies has grown into existence, and the difficulties are reduced to their minimum. If some strong and unreasonable power were to declare that Southend should be the only port in the British Islands where commerce should be carried on, no doubt Southend would have a still longer pier, and docks would be dug, and a harbour would be made, and Southend would cease to be the uninteresting spot it now is. Canton has been a Southend with its suggested monopoly. Amoy, Foochow and Ningpo are Southends without any monopoly.

There is a way of getting behind the hills and into the central districts of China—a way wherein the merchant may travel without toll or danger; where no robber can assail him at advantage; where secret imports cannot spoil his markets—a way which extends to the furthest limits of the empire, and whence convenient and innumerable ways branch forth, reaching to every hamlet of this great central region. The gate at which we must enter China is the mouth of the Yang-tse-Kiang. Give us entrance there, in our own ships, in our own steamers, and we can deposit our goods in every great city in the interior of China.

Let us start from Shanghai, and make an imaginary voyage up this river. With the exception of M. Hue, no European has ever yet sailed upon its higher waters, or has, indeed, been much above Nankin. M. Hue has added nothing to our knowledge for commercial purposes; but I have obtained access to some reports of Chinese, who traverse the whole distance frequently with commercial objects, and I may be able to tell something more of this river than is yet known to Englishmen.

Having threaded our way through the shallows at the mouth, we are in the largest, the deepest, and the most abundant river in the world. We pass for 200 miles through the rich province of Kiangsu, passing towns and anchorages less well known to ships of war. We will not now linger at Chinkiang, or even at Nankin, for those great cities are now nothing more than the scarred and wasted strongholds of a piratical power. All that was beautiful in the southern capital of China—even the famous porcelain pagoda—has been wantonly destroyed. Shot in from the land by the Imperialist besiegers, the rebels maintain themselves by plundering the rich country up and down the banks of the river, and the Imperialists are scarcely less burdensome to the country behind their camp. Commerce has fled from these parts. All we can ask of these plunderers is to let us pass in peace.

Hitherto we have been in a tidal river. Henceforth, although we must still reckon its width by miles, and its depth by tens of fathoms, our merchandize-laden steamer must be content to labor against an unchanging stream. We traverse the rich and thickly peopled province Anhui, and in our voyage of 200 miles through that province we find, besides a constant succession of towns two first-class cities, at which we may freely venture to display our merchandise and lighten our cargo.

Now we reach the province of Hupeh and Honan, the former on the north, the latter on the south bank. This is the country of the finest teas. It is here that the Oopak tea are grown, which by an unnatural route are forced down to Canton, being borne on men's backs across the mountains, instead of sent directly down the stream of the great river which banks produce them. Here are lakes, and broad streams running through them. But, more than this, here, just at this spot, in the confluence of the Yang-tse with the great river Han, which is itself banked with large cities, and busy with commerce.

At this confluence we have a conglomeration of enormous cities—Wuchang on the one hand, and Hanyang opposite, with immense suburbs extending far away. The population of these cities is differently estimated at 3,000,000 and 5,000,000 souls; but, whatever of still greater importance, these two cities are undoubtedly the first great emporia of Chinese commerce. Here is a market which may use all Manchester spinning, all Leeds weaving, all Sheffield grinding, and all Nottingham dressing, if we only have an honest examination of what those Celestials manufacture. If spirit, by worth while, if they are shy of their new guests, to employ a large ship in doing broad water—for we are told that there are five inches of rise from above to above—and a custom-duty to the sight of luxuries and necessaries which they may exchange for their cheap and abundant first-class teas. Surely it would be better than to get rid of them than to send them down the Yuen river to the Tungting lake, then by the capital city of Changteh, up the Siang river to the Ching district, across the mountain on men's backs to Lon Chang, and then down the northern river to Fatshan and Canton, for such is their present route. What charges must accumulate upon English goods that should try to come up the long devious route by which these teas descend!

We are only half way yet along our voyage. The river leads us through the whole province of Hupeh; and why should we not do a little business at the great cities of Kingchow and Tehang, the walls of which we must pass? To this city of Tehang, junks of 300 tons burden ascend in great numbers, and the water is still deep, though the bottom is rocky and dangerous.

A little higher up than Tehang we arrive at the town of Kwei. We are now 900 miles from the mouth of the Pang-tse, and here for the present our steamer must be content to stop, for here for the first time we meet with rapids. When the summer sun has melted the snows of Central Asia the trading junks shoot down these falls, and, empty of cargo, they can be forced up them. But if we are ever to pursue an unbroken voyage beyond this point, John Chinaman must add one other to his at present innumerable canals, and English engineers must teach him the secret of constructing locks.

It will not do, however, to be stopped by these rapids. The whole basin of the Yang-tse is one vast coal-field. From Nankin to Sz'chuen we have no difficulty in obtaining the means of locomotion. There are markets higher up, and thither, in a steamer to be put together above the falls, we must go. Let us suppose this—no great labor for Anglo-Saxons—to have been accomplished. The stream is still deep and navigable. It is crowded with junks, as M. Hue will testify. Kwei was just upon the boundary line between Sz'chuen and Hupeh, and Sz'chuen is the last province of China. Beyond that are the snows of Thibet and the swamps of Burmah. Sz'chuen is the finest province in all China. "You never see an ill-dressed man from Sz'chuen," says the Chinese proverb. "It grows more grain in one year than it can consume in ten," says another native authority, addicted, I fear, to exaggeration. This province appears to produce everything; more silk than any other province, more and better wax and tobacco, grass-cloth of the finest quality, tea of the choicest, grain in such quantities that its supplies act upon the distant market of Hang-chow. Moreover, the climate is variable, extremely hot and extremely cold, just suited for our woollens. My Chinese authority asserts that they penetrate there now even through the difficulties of the transit from Canton; and he says (I suspect with some exaggeration), that one-half of the long ells and shirting landed at Canton find their tedious way over the hills and up the rivers to Sz'chuen.

We must go up, therefore, above the Kwei falls, and must pursue our voyage till we reach the confluence of the Yang-tse with the Kialing, a river which comes down from the north. At this confluence stands the great city Chung-king, the second great commercial emporium of China. My authority states that under the walls of this city of Chung-king the lusty young Yang-tse is already as broad as the Canton river in front of the dear departed factories, and very deep and very rapid. You may go further if you please, for there is the western Soo-chow and all the land of poppy-bearing Yunnan higher up. But the stream grows rocky, and savage tribes from Thibet and Burmah make the way dangerous. We are getting to the western boundary of China Proper. We have done our work. We have "opened up the country." So here we will turn our steamer's head—shall we call her the Yang-tse?—and pass swiftly back, towing our junk loads of tea and silk and wax, and satisfied, I hope, with our speculative voyage. I have said nothing of consuls or consular establishments. The merchants appear to incline to the opinion that they do not want them, and are better without them. The say that Swatow and Woochow are growing into importance without consular protection, and that the want is not felt. I differ a little here. If you do not want consuls to protect, you want them to restrain. We must not allow a vagabond European population to run riot in the internal cities of China, or we will change the peaceful character of the people. Wuchang and Chunk-king might, however, maintain each a consul or consular agent with extended jurisdiction, and this would be ample for a commencement. A consul may be a great nuisance. A fussy consul, now in China, drove the carrying trade of one of our ports out of our hands. He made so many petty difficulties that the Chinaman wrote up and down the coast not to charter British ships. We must have no elves of the Circumlocution-office in the Yang-tse.

As I have brought our voyage so I must bring this paper to a close, for the subject is so vast, that fresh fields open upon one more rapidly than the past have been traversed. Surely you can work out for yourselves the tributaries of the Yang-tse and the Grand Canal pierced provinces of the north and the canals of the interior. Bradshaw's Railway Map is a blank sheet compared with these. I have spoken already of the advantages of the northern coast when Pekin may be reached from the sea. Give us free access to China; protect us in the exercise of our privileges until the Chinese are become accustomed to us, and fix our duty payments firmly and explicitly, and everything else will follow. The great piracy difficulty on the coast will find its own solution, for the coalfields will be opened, and some screw steam company will get possession of the coasting trade. The Custom-house bag-bear will disappear, for the goods will be put down at the door of the customer. Teas and silks will be beegbt cheaper, for different districts will be made to compete when we buy direct from the producer; and British manufactures, with moderate energy and enterprise will take a fair start.

I ought to my something of the trade with Thibet from India, but it is a long matter, and I have not courage to ask attention to it. Dr. Campbell, the superintendent of Darjeeling, who I hope has escaped those recent dangers, understands this subject thoroughly, and should be heard upon it before our treaty terms are settled.

Such are the facts and opinions I have been able to gather upon the British import trade in China. The subject is too vast to be treated in these columns. If I have wearied the public by saying so much, I am dismatisfied myself at having left so much unsaid. Many topics press upon me as I resolutely close the paper. Let me only add that all dealing with the interior of China is impossible unless you speak and speak the language of the people, and I have done.

Hotel Life in New York.

SENSIBLE SENTIMENTS OF MR. CHARLES MACKAY.

From the London Illustrated News.

The hotels in the great cities of America—in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, New Orleans, Chicago, Boston, &c.—are conducted in a peculiar system, and in a style of much magnificence. The British Isles possess no such caravanserais. Even the monster Hotel du Louvre, in Paris, is not to be compared with such establishments as the St. Nicholas, the Metropolitan, the Lafarge House, the Astor House, and many others in New York. Some of them make up a thousand beds, and others from five to six and seven hundred. The country is so immense, the distances from point to point are so great—such as from New Orleans to Boston, or from New York to Chicago and the Far West; the activity of commerce is so incessant, and in ramifications so extensive, that a much larger class of people than with us is compelled by business, public and private, to be continually upon the move.—Large hotels are, therefore, of positive necessity; and, were they solely confined to travelers, would deserve the praise of being, what they really are, the finest, most convenient, and best administered hotels in the world. It is not their fault that they have, in the course of time, and by the force of circumstances, been devoted to other uses, and that they have become the permanent homes of families, instead of remaining the temporary residences of strangers.

For a fixed charge of two dollars and a half a day (about ten shillings and sixpence English) the traveler has a comfortable bedroom, the use of a drawing-room, dining-room, reading room, and smoking room, and the full enjoyment of a liberal tariff, or bill of fare, for breakfast, luncheon, dinner, tea and supper. The two dollars and a half include all charges for servants, and every charge what ever that can be fairly included under the head of board and lodgings, except wine, beer and spirits. Being well lighted with gas, there is no charge for wax lights—that glaring pretext for extortion in England. The cookery is in general excellent. The breakfast is bounteous, and is spread from eight o'clock till twelve, between which hours fish, flesh and fowl, fresh meat and salt meat, eggs, omelettes, wheaten bread, rye bread, corn bread, corn cakes, rice cakes and buckwheat cakes (the last a far greater delicacy than England can show) are liberally distributed. From twelve o'clock till two the luncheon is spread with equal profusion; and from two till six there is a succession of dinners, the getting up of which would do credit to Mr. Francatelli of the Reform Club. As soon as dinner is over tea commences, and as soon as tea is laid away the cloths are laid for supper, so that from 8 in the morning till midnight there is one continued succession of feasts, at which Governors of States, Members of Congress, Judges, Generals, ex-Presidents of the Republics the magnates of commerce and the law, and all the miscellaneous and less distinguished public, male and female, sit down to partake. Whether the traveler do or do not partake is the same to the landlord. He may eat once, twice or thrice, or all day long if he pleases. The day is two dollars and a-half, even should he take his meals abroad. If ladies and families prefer to have apartments of their own, the price for lodging varies from three to five or ten dollars a day, according to the extent or elegances of accommodation required. In like manner the board of each individual, supplied in a private apartment, is raised from two dollars and a half per diem. The consequence is, that very few people board in their private rooms, and that nearly all breakfast, dine and sup in public, except the very young children, for whose convenience there is a separate table d'hote.

It will thus be seen that for the community these hotels are very comfortable, very cheap, and very luxurious, very cheap, and very lively. In consequence of the great difficulty that private families experience in procuring cooks and housemaids in a country where menial service is considered somewhat beneath the dignity of a native-born American, where service is called "help," to avoid wounding the susceptibility of free citizens, and left almost exclusively to negroes and newly-imported Irish, who too commonly, more especially the female portion of them, knowing nothing whatever, or exceeding little, of any household duties, and whose skill in cookery scarcely extends to the boiling of a potato, the mistress of families keeping house on their own account lead but an uncomfortable life. In England the newly-married couple take a house, furnish it, and live quietly home. In the cities of America—for the rule does not apply to the rural districts—they take apartments at the hotel, and live in public, too glad to take advantage of the ready means which it affords of escape from the nuisances attendant upon inefficient, incomplete, and insolent service. The young wife finds herself relieved from all the cares, miseries and responsibilities of housekeeping, and has nothing to think of but dress, visiting, reading and amusement. Brides who begin married life in hotels often continue in them from youth to maturity and age, without possessing the inestimable advantage and privilege of any more secluded home. To those who know nothing of domestic affairs, and to those who are willing to attend to them, but cannot procure proper "help" in their household, the hotel system is equally well adapted. It saves trouble, annoyance and expense;—but at what a cost of the domestic amenities. Perhaps not above one-half of that people who sit down to dinner in these superb establishments are travellers. The remainder are permanent residents—husbands, wives and children. To eat in public now and then may be desirable; but for ladies to take all their meals every day, all the year round in the full glare of publicity, to be always full dressed—almost hourly—with strangers from every part of America and of the world; to be, if young and handsome, the cynosure of all vagrant and idle eyes, either in the table d'hote or in the public drawing-room;—these are certainly not the conditions which to an Englishman's mind are conducive to the true happiness and charm of wedded life. And it is not only the influence of this state of things upon the husband and wife to which the Englishman objects, but its influence upon the young children who play about the corridors and halls of such mansions, and become prematurely old for want of fresh air and exercise, and overknowing from the experience they acquire and the acquaintances they contract. Perhaps fast people may consider these objections to savor of "old-fogyism;" perhaps not. The system is peculiar to America, and, therefore strikes the attention more forcibly than if it were common to the civilized world.

It is, doubtless, more the misfortune than the fault of American families that they live so much in this style; for, without good servants who know, and are not too supercilious and saucy to perform it, it is impossible for a lady, without shortening her life and making herself worse than a slave, to have a comfortable and happy home, or to govern it with pleasure or advantage either to herself or her family. Recently the New York and Philadelphia newspapers have been filled with the details of two scandalous cases—one ending in a tragedy—of which a New York and a Philadelphia Hotel were the scenes, and in both of which the fair fame of ladies was sacrificed. To these painful exposures it is not necessary to make further allusion; but they are so fresh in the public recollection that they cannot be passed over, even in this cursory glance at some of the evils attendant upon the undue publicity of female life in such monster hotels as I have endeavoured to describe.

To all the hotels is attached an establishment known as the "bar," where spirituous liquors are retailed under a nomenclature that puzzles the stranger, and takes a long acquaintanceship with American ways and manners to become familiar with. Gin-sling, brandy-smasher, whip-saw, skin, streak-of-lightning, cock-tail, rum-salad are but a few of the names of the drinks which are consumed at the bar, morning, noon and night, by persons who in a similar rank of life in England would no more think of going into a gin-palace under the bank. Every hotel, attached to the Reform Club, and free not only to the members but to the world without, and both largely availing themselves of it to drink and smoke, both by day and night, and you will be able to form a conception of the "bar" of an American hotel, and of the class of people who frequent it. But can such a system conduce to any virtuous development in this Republic? I will not answer the question, but leave it, and all the other questions mooted in this letter, for the consideration of those who desire that America should be as wise and happy in the private relations of her citizens as she is free and independent in her relations to the great comity of the world.

Attempt to Excite a Mutiny.

AN AMERICAN SEAMAN CHARGED WITH ATTEMPTING TO EXCITE A MUTINY IN THE 9TH REGIMENT.

At the Police Court, yesterday (Friday), the Mayor, the only Magistrate present, Thos. Johnson, described as an American seaman, was charged with writing on Wednesday, the 23rd of Dec. and sending a letter to the soldiers of the 9th regiment, at present at Sunderland Barracks, in order that the same might be circulated amongst the soldiers for the purpose of exciting them to mutiny.'

Mr. Gifford shortly detailed the facts of the case. He said, on Wednesday evening, a soldier named Kenney, a private of the 9th Regiment, met the prisoner in the Low-street, near Paddy's Goose, who got into conversation with him, and gave him a letter to be delivered at the Barracks for the purpose of circulating it amongst the soldiers. The prisoner told Kenney that he would wait for an answer until the following evening, when he would be waiting for it in front of the Sailors' Home. Kenney immediately gave the letter to Corporal Blanchfield, by whom it was afterwards given to the color-sergeant, and ultimately found its way into the hands of the commanding-officer, Major Bethune. The prisoner was taken into custody by a ruse; he (Mr. Gifford) wrote a letter, which he gave into the hands of Kenney, who met the prisoner and gave it to him. Some men in plain clothes were watching, and as soon as Kenney left the prisoner the latter was apprehended, and the letter he (Mr.G.) had written was found upon him.

The following evidence was then given—

John Kenney—I am a private in the 9th regiment. I was in the Low-street, near Paddy's Goose, on Wednesday night; I met the prisoner as I was going in; he gave me a letter and told me to give it to one of the corporals. The letter was not directed to any one, but it was sealed up. I said, "does it matter what corporal I give it to?" The prisoner replied, "No." The same night, when I returned to the barracks, I gave the letter to corporal Planchfield. I have no doubt the prisoner is the man who gave me the letter. You (Mr. Gifford) gave me a letter at the barracks to deliver to the prisoner. I gave it to him on the Moor last night about six o'clock. The prisoner was immediately after taken into custody.

Corporal John Blanchfield—I was in the barrack-room on the night of the 23rd, and saw private Kenney, who handed me a letter. I read it, and considered it my duty to hand it over to color-sergeant Danby.

Color-Sergeant Danby—The letter was handed to me on Wednesday evening by Corporal Blanchfield. I looked over it, and when I saw its character I thought it was my duty to lay it before the commanding officer.

Major Duncan Bethune—This letter was placed in my hands early yesterday morning; it came from color-sergeant Danby. I immediately inquired how it found its way into the barracks, when private Kenney gave me the same information he has just stated to the court. When I read it I imagined it was written by some insane individual, and thought it my duty to bring it up to his worship the Mayor, who arranged to discover the individual who wrote it. We did so in the manner described by Mr. Gifford. The letter is a highly improper one.

The following portions of the letter were read:

"Sunderland, Dec. 23, 1857.

"SOLDIERS!—The day, the very hour, has arrived, at which your country must become a republic or go back to despotism; and I have every reason to believe that all the people sincerely desire a complete change of government, but, through the damnable policy of those German bastards and petty tyrants, they are setting class against class, and man against man, and cannot attain their liberty without your example and assistance. Your example, that shall fire the rest of the army, arouse all the people, and set your country at once and forever free! Is there not something nobler in the bare idea of such a thing, than throwing your time and life away to a Government that has sold the liberties of Europe, as it has sold the rights of its own poor and oppressed citizens, your lives and those of your relations?" * * *

I now take upon myself that responsibility, and make the following proposals to you:—To-morrow night, at ten o'clock, I will be at the barracks, when you shall disarm and secure your officers, and appoint others from the ranks, and follow me from the barracks up High-street, proclaiming a republic and calling the citizens to arms. * * * To-morrow night I will walk in front of the Sailors' Home, on the Moor, from six until nine, waiting your answer to this appeal."

Chief Constable Gifford—The letter written by the prisoner was placed in my hands yesterday. Towards night I placed in the hands of Kenney, as an answer to this letter, another letter containing the following:

"In answer to your's of yesterday, we, the soldiers of the 9th, are prepared to do our duty."

I saw Kenney speak to the prisoner last night on the Moor, in front of the Sailors' Home. After a short conversation they separated, and I then secured the prisoner. I found crumpled in his hand the letter I had given the private Kenney. He had to force it from him. I asked William Barter, the prisoner his name, and he said it was Barter. I asked him if he lived in the Sailors' Home; he replied "Yes." I asked him what room: he replied "No. 25, but you'll find nothing there." I asked him why he made a remark of that kind; he said, "I see I have gone a little too far; I will answer no more questions." At the station I asked him what he intended to do with the officers—if he intended to kill them: he said "Yes, if they resisted." He subsequently gave his name as Thomas Johnson. He was searched, and a small matter of coin found on him. In answer to questions that I put to him last night, he stated that he belonged to New York—that he was a seaman, and had come down by the "run" from London a fortnight ago. I have searched the prisoner's room in the Sailors' Home, and found merely some luggage, and in one of his boxes two small bottles, labelled laudanum—poison; also some pieces of glass, as if a bottle had been broken.

Mr. Francis, surgeon—There was laudanum in both bottles. They have been purchased in Sunderland.

Mr. Gifford—The prisoner said he had bought laudanum at different stores until he had a bottle full when he took it at a draught, and if it had not made him sick he should not have been there that night.

The prisoner—I said I took it on Monday night.

Mr. Gifford—Yes; you stated Monday night.

The prisoner—I did not say I would murder the officers. I told you I had no occasion to kill the officers if the men would join me.

Mr. Francis—I examined the prisoner last night, and was of opinion that he was in an insane state of mind, but whether from intemperance or taking laudanum I cannot tell. His eyes do not show as if he was suffering from the effects of laudanum. The prisoner was remanded.—London Times.

The Late Outrage at St. Thomas.

From the London Free Press.

A Coroners Jury having been called to determine whose body it was that was found in the Orange Lodge at St. Thomas, under circumstances already detailed in these columns several witnesses were called who identified the body as that of the deceased Mrs. Samuel Paddon. The jury, after hearing the evidence returned the following verdict:—

1st, That the body is fully proven to be the body of the late Mrs. Paddon.

2nd. That the deceased came to her death by natural causes.

3rd, That the jury find by indisputable evidence, that the body so found was taken out of the grave-yard known as the St. Thomas Cemetery, and that such body was taken out of the ground by William F. Sparling, shoemaker, of this town, and others, to the jurors unknown.

4th, That the jurors have great reason to complain of the unsatisfactory answers given by Dr. Caughill, W. F. Sparling, and Dr. Sanderson, to questions which in the opinion of the jury, were calculated to bring out facts necessary to the investigation, and have to express their disapprobation of the same; as also, the abhorrence in which they hold the sacrilegious removal of the sacred dead, and would strongly urge that all legal means should be used to bring the guilty party to justice.

W. F. Sparling and Dr. Caughill had to give bail for their appearance next day.

The members of the Orange fraternity naturally feel deeply incensed that a Lodge Room should have been used for such a purpose, and Lodge No. 257 have published the following, which appears in the columns of the St. Thomas Dispatch:—

"In accordance with a resolution passed at a meeting of Orange Lodge, No. 257, of St. Thomas, the Master, past Master, and officers of the said Lodge, desire to express their abhorence and detestation of a gross outrage upon private and public feeling lately committed by certain persons in this town, in disinterring for dissection the body of the late Mrs. Samuel Paddon.—The undersigned also, on the part of the Lodge, further desire to express their deep regret and indignation, that any person or persons should have insulted the Orange Society by secreting the body so violated from the sanctuary of the tomb in an Orange Lodge Room, and take this opportunity publicly to declare their intense feeling of regret that their room should have been surreptitiously used for a purpose so abhorrent to their feelings, and trust that the guilty parties may be made to feel by proper punishment that the outrage committed by them upon the feelings of the community, and against common decency, shall not escape its just recompense."

Railroad Sleepers.

The consumption of timber on American railroads for the single article of sleepers, is so great as almost to defy calculation.—Some attempts have been made to lessen this consumption by subjecting the sleepers to a process which will prevent or check their decay. Salt has been extensively tried, but in a very imperfect manner.—Some companies have adopted the kyanizing process, and keep their sleepers immersed in the liquor a long time. But this process requires time and a great deal of space where much is to be done. Salt is about to be employed on one of the New Jersey roads in a way somewhat different from former practice. A machine was recently patented to a citizen of Trenton which bores a log with astonishing rapidity at the same time making the hole perfectly straight all the way through—that is, if the hole be started at the centre of the log or sparring, the auger will come out at the exact centre of the other end, a feat which no hand-boring can perform. By this machine it is intended to perforate the sleepers from end to end, fill the cavity with salt, and plug up. But this process will be an expensive one, as the cost of salt will be considerable. A cheaper and better method would be to boil the sleepers in common gas tar. This would charge the pores with a substance that would enable the wood to resist decay for many years. But while all railroad men are sensible of the immense number of sleepers which are called for every year, and that they are annually becoming dearer, no railroad manager seems to have adopted any plan for producing them. If the long stretches of railroad which are everywhere found were lined with chestnut or chesnut trees, say in double rows on each side, this expedient would establish an unfailing supply of the best material for sleepers. The planting could be done by contract at a cheap rate, and the trees would grow up faster than the sleepers decay. Either the planting process must be studied, or better or cheaper modes of preserving sleepers introduced, or an indestructable substitute invented, as the forests of our country will not always support the heavy drain upon them required to keep up nearly 30,000 miles of railroads.

ARRIVAL OF THE "CANADA."

Attempted Assassination of Napoleon.

HALIFAX, Jan. 28.

The Royal Mail steam-ship Canada, Captain Lang, has arrived. The news by this arrival is three days later, and is important.

An attempt had been made upon the life of the Emperor Napoleon, but it failed, though a projectile pierced his hat.

The Leviathan had been pushed nearly to the end of the launching ways. Little else would be done till the high tides of January float her.

The London money market was easier. The Bank of England had reduced its rate to five per cent.

Messrs. C. J. Grey & Sons, in the Canadian trade, have suspended.

The American barque Adriatic, which was confiscated by the Court of Six for coming in collision with the steamship Lyonnais, had escaped from Marseilles.

A new Spanish Ministry had been organized.

News from India, one week later, had been received; but there was nothing further from Cawnpore, owing to the interception of mails between Bombay and Calcutta.

COMMERCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

The sales of the week in the Liverpool Cotton market, were 35,000 bales—the market closing at a decline of ⅛ on fair and middling qualities. The lower grades were less affected.

News by the "Kangaroo."

JANUARY 28, 1858.

Additional telegrams of Indian news taken out by the Europa have been received from Malta. The dates are: Calcutta, Dec. 11; Bombay, Dec. 18.

The death of Sir H. Havelock is confirmed.

On the 24th Nov., Sir Colin Campbell evacuated Lucknow, in presence of the whole force of Oudo. He retired to Cawnpore.

The correspondent of the Times speaks of actions with the Gwalior mutineers. Gen. Windham, on the 28th November, attacked part of the Gwalior mutineers, near Cawnpore, and defeated them. Next day he was surprised, and lost all his tents, and had retreated into his entrenchments, whence, however, he made a successful sortie upon the enemy. Sir Colin Campbell heard the firing from the Oude side, and came up and above the enemy from his position in Cawnpore. On the 7th December, the commander in Chief attacked the Gwalior men, 14,000 strong. The victory was decisive. The enemy was pursued fourteen miles along Calpee Road, and lost all their cannon except eight, all their carts, all their ammunition, and all their baggage.

Another despatch from Sir Colin Campbell says, that the Gwalior fugitives were subsequently fallen in with by General Grant, as they were beginning to cross the Ganges, and that, after some hard fighting, fifteen guns, with all their stores, ammunition, &c., were captured. General Grant was slightly wounded, but lost no men, although the enemy lost about 100.

The Times considers the Gwalior contingent for all practical purposes annihilated.

The Bengal 34th and 72d regiments had mutinied—thus extinguishing the native Bengal army. Two companies of the 72d were cut up by sailors at Deesa.

There were 24,000 European troops in Bengal Presidency.

The steamship Great Britain, with 1,000 cavalry, had reached Bombay.

All was quiet in the Punjaub and Rohilcund.

The Oude insurgents were pushing to the Southward, and had compelled the Ghoorkas to retire from Azinghur and Joonpore stations.

An insurrection had broken out at Kolapore, but was speedily suppressed.

In Southern Mahratta Country, attempts had been made to resist the disarming act, but the insurgents were totally defeated.

The mails reached England on the 12th.

A week later news, under the new arrangements for a weekly mail, was expected to arrive on the day of the Kangaroo's sailing.

Dates from Hong Kong up to 29th November, state that the Admiral with the chief part of the fleet, had advanced up the Canton river. No operations had been commenced.

Lord Elgin had gone to Macao, at which place, the French Plenipotentiary and Russian Minister were.

All was quiet in North China.

An attack on Canton is immediately expected on the arrival of reinforcements, which were due. The city is reported to be mined, and resistance expected.

FRANCE.

No political news of importance.

An explosion of heating apparatus in the Church of St. Sulpice Parish had occurred during Divine Service, killing three persons, and wounding several others.

AUSTRIA.

A letter from Vienna states that the reduction in the Austrian army has been more considerable than expected, 50,000 men having been already discharged, whereby a saving of 22,000,000 florins had been effected.

PRUSSIA.

The Prince of Prussia had determined to visit England to assist at his son's marriage to the Princess Royal.

Great preparations were making in England for the event, and also at Berlin for the entry of the Royal Pair into that city.

MADAGASCAR.

Intelligence has been received of a continued persecution of Christians in Madagascar. Thirteen persons had been subjected to torture, and numbers reduced to slavery.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The Leviathan was moved yesterday nearly twenty feet. This was accomplished in an almost continuous movement of short slips of one and two inches at a time. After dinner further progress was adjourned till high water to-day, when the remaining feet to the bottom of the launching ways are expected to be accomplished. It is expected that she will be moved down the rest of the way to-day in about an hour, and finally she will be hauled off into the river by Tootsum's anchor.

AUSTRALIA.

Yesterday the Trent arrived at Southampton with the heavy portion of Australian mails.—Among her cargo is gold dust to the value of £200,000. Her mails consist of upwards of 80,000 letters and 120,000 newspapers.

INDIA.

HALIFAX, Jan'y 28.

The "Canada" called off Cork on 17th, and brought mails and 67 passengers of the disabled steamer "Ariel."

She passed the "Persia" bound to Liverpool on the 16th.

The "Ariel" after leaving Cowes, experienced strong westerly gales, which gradually increased till Jan. 6th, when at 9 a.m., in lat. 50, long. 29, she broke the starboard shaft just outside the ship. She was hove to under drag of storm sails. On the morning of the 7th it was found that her port-wheel could be worked. The ship was then put about and moved east at about the rate of 8 knots per hour. She shipped several tremendous seas, and broke her forecyard, when she was again laid to until the morning of the 9th. She succeeded in sighting Cape Clear on Monday, the 14th, and reached Queenstown about noon next day.

A further reduction of the rate of interest by the Bank of England was anticipated in a week or two.

FRANCE.

An attempt upon the Emperor's life was made on the evening of the 14th, on their Majesties' arrival at the opera house.—Three explosions coming from hollow projectiles were heard. Sixty persons were wounded and three killed. The Emperor's hat was pierced, and his aid-de-camp slightly wounded. Two footmen were also wounded, and one of the horses attached to the carriage killed. The conspirators are Italians, and many arrests were made. After the opera the Emperor was enthusiastically hailed by the populace.

INDIA.

Bombay dates are received to December 24th.

The garrison of Futtephore was pressed by insurgents, and have abandoned part of their entrenchments to take up a more secure position.

A body of insurgents had been defeated at Cheerowree and 150 killed.

Three British officers were killed.

The insurgents in the neighbourhood of Jubbulpore were attacked on the 29th November without any decisive result.

Reinforcements were marching there.

Several executions of native chiefs had taken place.

The Punjab, Scinde, and Bombay were quiet.

SPAIN.

The Queen's speech announces that she has accepted the mediation of France and England in the quarrel with Mexico, but that under all circumstances the honor of Spain shall be preserved.

Istaritz is at the head of the new Ministry.

ITALY.

Mazzini has published an address to the people of Italy, telling them that to conspire is not a right but a duty.

Deaths of Distinguished Personages.

Our columns to-day present an unusual number of obituaries—all of them of persons who have left the impress of their talents upon the age. Amongst them the diplomatic and military professions and the tragic art have each a representative. It is seldom that it falls to the lot of the journalist to record in a single page the deaths of so many eminent persons, all of whom are destined to cut a prominent figure in history. First among them, for the recent glory which attaches to his exploits, we have to mention the gallant Sir Henry Havelock, the saviour of the British empire in India, and next by a singular coincidence, that of Marshal Radetsky, the saviour of the Austrian empire in Italy. No military leader ever achieved so much in so short a time as Sir Henry Havelock; and certainly no man ever did more for the honor and glory of the British arms. His reputation has been acquired without the stain of a single weakness or cruelty—his being one of those evenly balanced minds which seem never to have been carried away by excess of zeal. Not so his military compeer, Radetsky. Although he rendered important services to his sovereign, he was betrayed by his devotion to him into the commission of barbarities which must ever detract from his reputation as a gallant soldier.

The death of Radschid Pacha, one of the ablest and most enlightened men in Turkey, and who was instrumental in carrying through the reforms originated in the reign of the Sultan Mahmoud, and confirmed and extended by the Hatti Scherif of Gulhane, will create general regret. The Christian population of that empire, and the cause of religious toleration in general, loses in him a sincere and active friend.

In the long expected decease of Rachel, the greatest of living tragedians, the arts lose a genius that we may never hope to behold again. To her speciality of gifts may be applied the well known observation of Lord Dudley:—"She has rendered past glory doubtful and future glory impossible."

While most of these great minds and brilliant talents lived long enough to enjoy the rewards to which their merits and the gratitude of their compatriots entitle them, it is painful to reflect that poor Havelock was cut off just as the fruits of a long and painful career were placed within his grasp. It is to be hoped that the niggardly spirit in which these honors were dealt out to the dead hero by his sovereign will relax into a more generous appreciation of his services by the bestowal of a peerage upon his son.—*N. The Seat of Government.

It is announced by the Government that upon the reference from our Legislature to the Queen, as to the most fitting site for the erection of permanent buildings, wherein to transact the public business of the country, the Imperial authorities have recommended Ottawa as the most suitable for the purpose. Many of our readers will enquire the precise geographical position, and what are its peculiar claims to be elevated into the chief city of Canada. To the first, it will be sufficient that it is set down on the River Ottawa, 87 miles above its point of confluence with the River St. Lawrence, and received its now name in 1854, when it was admitted in the list of cities, its earlier name having been Bytown. To the question of precedence in governmental favor, there is nothing we are aware of to recommend it, save its supposed security of defence and the inconvenience of reaching it. It is just such a selection as an English gentleman in his native simplicity might be expected to make. If he comes here to buy a farm, he is sure to select the most worthless; his greatest ambition being satisfied with an unapproachable situation, barren scenery, Indian society, and a duck's pond. It is to be hoped, however, that as the Englishman's choice in this instance, is unaccompanied with English funds wherewith to carry out his style of improvements, the Legislature will not be so foolish as to accept his judgment to form the basis of Provincial expenditure.

The "Peterboro' Watchman."

The prospectus of a new journal to be called the Peterboro' Watchman is in course of distribution. The promises it makes to the community are such as cannot but enlist a very kindly sympathy towards the furtherance of its views. They are moderate, liberal and progressive, confirming "equal rights to all," and supporting civil and religious liberty. It declares "the people" to be the recognized source of all political power, disclaiming bigotry and sectarianism, and claims for the inhabitants of Western Canada the right of deciding upon the great and momentous questions which agitate the public mind."

What prospects the promoters of the Peterboro' Watchman have of early appearance we are not apprised; but we take the present occasion to offer it a sincere promise of welcome, when it shall enter the body of which it will without doubt form a most respectable feature, at the same time that it will add materially to the strength of our party.

The Hard Times.

Every body is ready to be drawn into discussion on the subject of the hardness of the times, and many excuse themselves from performing their engagements, under shelter of the common cry. There are some people to whom the seasons bring no changes, they are always in hard times; and there are others who refuse to free themselves of a debt which runs at the highest, at six per cent interest, while they employ their funds in the realization of thirty per cent, or in securing estates for their descendents. There is great difficulty in discriminating between the debtor who cannot pay, without reducing himself to want, and he who only suffers the inconvenience of a reduction in his treasury, by paying in a bad season. As a rule, it may be taken that no class, and perhaps no individual, except such as live on salaries, will entirely escape the bad consequences of the present panic; and as another rule, every one who is in debt, had better begin by making voluntary efforts to free himself, even if it does cost him more shillings in the pound than he owes; rather than submit to the more disagreeable necessity of seeing his territory invaded, and forced restitution made, at a sacrifice. The man who has what is called plenty of property, is not to be pitied, if his greed of gain outweighs his moral principle, and he is forced to do that which his thankfulness for being above despair, ought to make him keen to acquit himself of. It is the poor struggling creature, whose little is his all, that should excite compassion, and to such instances it is to be hoped that sentiment will be exercised in its fullest; but in order that it can be so, the comparatively rich must exert a power equal to that they possess.

Says he—"Taken as a whole, upon our experience as an attendant upon the sessions of the Council, a more intelligent set of men have not occupied the seats." "A GROWING EVIL.—The practice of retailing the utterances of dying men, with extravagant accounts of their lives, which certain Reverends are in the habit of delighting their audiences with, is becoming one of the most intolerable nuisances of the day. Men with neither the feelings nor the education of gentlemen, but whom some unfortunate mishap hath clothed with a Reverend prefix, appear to think nothing of mounting the platform and to the disgust of every honorable mind, and the most serious injury to the feelings of friends and relatives, break through the sanctity of the bedchamber, and retail the utterances of men who supposed themselves at the time on their dying couch, and unburdened their soul to one whose profession ought to be the guarantee for secrecy. A practice so revolting ought, and we trust will be frowned down, even though the act should necessitate a violation of the self-asserted privileges of Reverend platform speakers. Those who attended a Missionary meeting recently held in a neighboring Township, will understand more fully the occasion of these remarks."—Peterborough Review.

The style of the above article is so coarse, and the sentiment so unchristian, that we cannot allow it to pass unnoticed. What particular act has occasioned this wholesale denunciation of the practice of clergymen, who offer their services for the edification of such as attend at Missionary Meetings, is not introduced to the reader; and as we are not aware of what it is, beyond what the article itself furnishes, we cannot judge of its character; it is enough that the general allusions are indecent, and calculated to foster a false criticism upon the addresses of clergymen on subjects connected with religion. It may be "an intolerable nuisance" for an invalid upon his recovering from a helpless condition, to be reminded of the hopeless feeling he experienced, when he was persuaded that his hour was come, but what will be the intensity of that hopelessness, if upon his recovery, he forgets the mercy that extended to him a respite, and denies the Interesting Information from the Cook Expedition.

DOE. COOK'S REPORT.

CAMP SCOTT, (V. T. Nov. 29, 1858.

DEAR MAJOR,—I left our Black's Fort, 16 miles from Fort Bridger, on the 7th instant, after one day's march from the point of uniting the commands by Col. Johnston. You now find us in this camp, named in honor of our cherished chief, whose forethought and action has placed us in winter quarters, under excellent shelter, without the blow of an axe. Our first day's march was over a dreary waste, made more desolate by the fall of snow two days previous, and the driving storm of snow and wind which met us in the middle of the march, miles from wood, water, grass, or shelter. To return was destruction; to advance was, apparently to court it. The number of animals were insufficient to move either our mule or contractor's trains. Still we struggled on, losing strength hourly by the destruction of our animals; on the evening of the 8th we prepared for the contest again. On the morning of the 9th a portion struck camp and advanced to the next place of shelter; there, while waiting the arrival of the rear, to have our animals struck down by cold, hunger and thirst. The rear (5th infantry) could not make a march of five miles in a day to overtake us without leaving the supplies behind. Without sustenance for animals almost starved before we joined the main body, almost without fuel, that regiment, and the trains it escorted, passed the day traveling against one of the most severe storms of snow and wind I have experienced for many years, and camped in a dreary spot, open to the full blast of the storm, with the thermometer at 6° below at 6 A. M., while we were under shelter of bluffs. The orders will show our march. It was one magnificent struggle from the beginning to this place. One more day's march and our meat ration—beef, horse and mule—would have been diminutively small for the winter. The last company of the 10th infantry, escorting the last of the supply trains to Fort Bridger, reached this camp at 10 P. M. on the 22nd; thus requiring six days to move our little army and its supplies less than six miles. In its limbs the giant's strength was expended; but the will which moved this force, and the spirits which gave this will vitality, were brighter and stronger as the constitution became weaker; and if he had said "On," on we would have gone, feeling that what he would direct would be right. The assurance you gave me of confidence in my commander have been more than realized, and he now has, I believe, the unbounded confidence of the army. You will see from his letters and orders how he grappled with the difficulties in his path, and I hope the Spring will see him the conqueror. This little army is in fine health and in cheerful spirits. The men have borne their trials without a murmer—duty is severe upon officers and men; but not a word of complaint have I heard. We have all endured alike, and the fact that Col. Johnston has on the march "footed it," as did the men: suffers the same exposure, and will not permit the officer to receive more than the soldier, has endeared him to all. We are now in camp, nicely housed; the most of us in wall-tents; the men all in "Sibley, tents." The latter save the necessity of huts, and are the only suitable tents for the men. The wall tent, with a stove, is the only one for an officer. The tents furnished (Sibley tents) are very inferior, especially those made by the quarter-master; inferior in material and make, and small and unequal in size. One tent is allowed to eighteen men now, but in a few days they will be issued at one to sixteen; even that would be insufficient were not the men on guard or other duty. Our animals are all absent, except those needed for police purposes and for immediate consumption.

This place (Fort Bridger) is admirably located; timber abundant close by for fuel and garrison; grass can be cut within 200 yards of the garrison; water at the door; and it commands every road leading into the country. The Mormons burned the buildings of this place and Fort Supply; at the latter place they piled up their grain and set fire to it; left their potatoes, turnips, &c., in the ground. The walls of Fort Bridger are standing; they were built for defence last fall; 6 feet through at base, 14 at top, 16 feet high, and 100 by 110 on one part, 100 by 75 on another. They tried to fire the grass, but snow fell and extinguished it. The snow was our salvation. When the grass was burned the flames scorched the trees 60 feet high. Had the command advanced sooner than it did the animals would have starved, and the army, could not have found or reached a place of shelter. Our grass is eaten up for three miles around us; but we have animals on Smith's Fork, (three miles off,) and there is grass enough there for the whole band; but no shelter and insufficient wood. This valley is warm, wooded and watered, and welcomed us. Our legs are united, or fast getting so; and when spring comes a more devastating swarm of grasshoppers will never have swept that valley of Salt Lake than will this army be, if our progress is molested. This people design our starvation, our destruction; and there is no device man can resort to which they will not practice —from assassination, murder, fire and flood. The robbers and evasions will scatter and form bands of guerillas, and no party, no train, no band of cattle, will pass to the valley if they can murder, burn, or run off. The Mormons have great fear of mounted men; and had not Colonel Johnston brought up the two companies of the 2nd. from Laramie, (companies which were to be called to Kearney and which directions had been given to prepare at K.,) from the negligence of the guards and the watchfulness of the Mormons, we would now be struggling by hard to get here, and without meat. Had the 2nd dragoons been sent at the time directed—telegraphed—not an animal would have been lost by theft. The army could not, however, have entered the valley without leaving its supplies behind. The Mormons are a set of cowards, like all assassins and bullies; and I fear their leaders, and those who have no claims in the valley, will run away, requiring their deluded followers to destroy their property, lest it might benefit us. The leaders rely on such conduct as was pursued by Congress in the Kansas question. I hope Congress will declare the Territory in rebellion, and call upon all Governors and commanding officers to arrest and keep in custody all persons leaving the Territory, and especially the leaders, unless accompanied by a safeguard or passport.

Additional News from India.

ARRIVAL OF THE MAILS IN LONDON—GEN. WINDHAM'S REPEAT CONFIRMED—PARTICULARS OF THE AFFAIR—EVACUATION OF LUCKNOW BY SIR COLIN CAMPBELL—THE VICTORIOUS AND THE MOURNING—THE HISTORY OF THE DEFENCE OF LUCKNOW.

The Indian mails, with dates from Calcutta to the 31st of December, arrived in London on the 13th of January. The following dispatch published by the East India House contains particulars not yet published:

The Quartermaster-General having relieved the Lucknow garrison, returned to Cawnpore with the women, the wounded, and the state prisoners, 23 lacs of rupees and the King's jewels; also all the guns worth taking away. He left in the garrison the 1st division of the Gwalior contingent, 3,000 in number, which had arrived near Cawnpore, after crossing the Jumna at Calpee, taking all their guns except one light field-piece.

On the 27th November the main body of the Gwalior contingent under the command of Tantia Topee, attacked the position of Cawnpore. They were repulsed with severe loss on the 28th November. The Rifles returned two of their 18 pounders. The 64th Regiment suffered severely.

All the other details of Cawnpore and Grant's successes have been made public, and some of the news in the telegram actually reached London by the ordinary post a month sooner.

No details of the affairs at Cawnpore have yet been published. The Bengal Hurkaru considers the operations of Campbell as masterly, and it doubles the fame of Havelock and Brigadier Wilson. The same authority considers that the rebellion is not so nearly at an end as many have sanguinely supposed in India, and as the government in England have been led to believe.

No list of the killed and wounded at Cawnpore is published.

It was not known at Calcutta upon what day Havelock died, nor the cause of his death.

General Windham, commanding at Cawnpore, had marched on the 26th November, to attack a portion of the rebels in position eight miles from Cawnpore. He met with short opposition, but after a fight routed the body, taking all their guns but one, and returned to Cawnpore that evening. On the 27th November the whole Gwalior contingent, strengthened by rebels from various parts, attacked Cawnpore, near Cawnpore. The British regiments came to intrenchments, and on the night of the 28th the rebels burnt down the camp of the 34th, 82nd, and 88th regiments. On the 29th they attacked the entrenchments from the Canal and Subadars' Tank. A sortie made against the assailants from the Canal was most successful; the rifles beat back the rebels, and brought in two of their 18-pounders. The fire of the rebels from the subdars tank was also quite arrested, but our extreme right, and 64th regiment suffered severely. Brigadier Wilson is killed and Major Stirchard is badly wounded. Sir Colin Campbell arrived at Cawnpore at 5 P. M. on the 28th. The ladies and children of the Lucknow Garrison are encamped four miles from Cawnpore."

No. 3.—From Cawnpore, Dec. 7, 12 noon.—From the commander-in-Chief, to Calcutta, to the Governor General:

"Having yesterday morning finally completed the arrangements for putting the remainder of sick and wounded, 800 in number, in safety, the Gwalior Contingent, with its allies, were attacked at 11 A. M. The affair ended in the complete route of the enemy, whose camp captured, was pursued 14 miles along the Calpee road, and we captured 16 guns of different calibre, 26 battery carts, wagons, &c., besides an immense quantity of ammunition of all sorts, park stores, grain, bullocks, and the whole baggage of the force. Sir Colin describes his loss as insignificant; he had not heard of the death of any officer except Lieutenant Salmond.

An extraordinary Gazette, published at Calcutta, contains Brigadier Inglis' narratives of events at Lucknow. It is preceded by a general order in Council, in which the Governor-General specifies numerous officers and civilians who distinguished themselves during the defence.—His Excellency believes that there never has a tale been told which will stir the hearts of Englishwomen as the simple, earnest narrative of Brigadier Inglis." His Excellency also mentions the names of Birch, Polehampton, Barbor, and Hall among the noble women who distinguished themselves, and refers in terms of deep regret to the death of General Havelock. Six months batta is to be awarded to every officer and soldier who formed part of the garrison, and the civilian who shared in the defence.

The Calcutta Englishman says that young Bahadoor, with 9,000 Goorkha troops, was on his way to join Sir Colin Campbell.

In the affair at Mundeweya the British artillery silenced the five guns in the enemy's centre, and a party of her Majesty's 14th Dragoons took the guns. The casualties were—Lieutenant Rodmayne, 14th Dragoons, killed, and eight rank and file; Lieutenant James wounded severely in the arm; Lieutenant Martin, ditto, in the leg; Lieutenant Prendergast, slightly, four other officers very slightly, and 68 rank and file.

IMPORTANT DISPATCHES FROM SIR COLIN CAMPBELL AND GEN. WINDHAM.

No. 1.—From Cawnpore, 26th November, 11 P. M. From General Windham, to Calcutta, to the Governor General:

"I this morning attacked the 1st Division of the Gwalior, amounting to upwards of 3,000, with two 17-inch iron howitzers, two light field guns, upon the Pandoo River, eight miles from Cawnpore. After a fight for one hour and a half, we completely routed them, and captured all but one light gun."

No. 2.—From Allahabad, Thursday, 1st Dec., 8:20 A. M. From C. Chester, to Calcutta, to C. Bodun, Esq.

The Gwalior contingent attacked Nowabgunge, near Cawnpore on the 27th ult. The British troops retired on the entrenchments, and on the night of the 27th, the rebels burnt down the camp of the 34th, 82nd, and 88th regiments. On the 28th they attacked the entrenchments from the Canal and Subadars' Tank. A sortie made against the assailants from the Canal was most successful; the rifles beat back the rebels, and brought in two of their 18-pounders. The fire of the rebels from the subdars tank was also quite arrested, but our extreme right, and 64th regiment suffered severely. Brigadier Wilson is killed and Major Stirchard is badly wounded. Sir Colin Campbell arrived at Cawnpore at 5 P. M. on the 28th. The ladies and children of the Lucknow Garrison are encamped four miles from Cawnpore."

No. 3.—From Cawnpore, Dec. 7, 12 noon.—From the commander-in-Chief, to Calcutta, to the Governor General:

"Having yesterday morning finally completed the arrangements for putting the remainder of sick and wounded, 800 in number, in safety, the Gwalior Contingent, with its allies, were attacked at 11 A. M. The affair ended in the complete route of the enemy, whose camp captured, was pursued 14 miles along the Calpee road, and we captured 16 guns of different calibre, 26 battery carts, wagons, &c., besides an immense quantity of ammunition of all sorts, park stores, grain, bullocks, and the whole of the baggage of the force. Our loss was insignificant, and I have not heard of the death of any officers except Lieut Salmond, A. D. C., to General Grant. I hold here to recognize the force.

No. 4.—From Allahabad, Dec. 8. From Brigadier Campbell to Lord Dunkill, Military Secretary:

☞The James Buchanan is the name of a slave schooner that has just landed a cargo of slaves on the coast of Cuba. The name was a delicate compliment. The slaves should be sent to Kansas.

CHINA.

From the Special Correspondent of the Times.

HONG KONG, Nov. 11.

I hope to be able to tell you by the next mail that we are at least "before Canton." All our powers of force and persuasion are arrived, or are upon the eve of arrival. Mr. Read has come in his gigantic ship, the Minnesota, and although the monster made an involuntary breach of etiquette in the number of guns fired, the Plenipos have fraternized in cordial fashion. It is understood that on the 16th the Calcutta flag-ship will change her anchorage for Tiger Island. The rest of our fleet will gradually gather about her up the river. Then in deliberate strength our heavy-armed vessels will move right up and occupy the river under the walls of Canton. They will clear the way, remove all obstacles, protect the necessary reconnaissances of the land approaches to the city, and make matters comfortable for a final assault.—Then the great Yeh will be summoned, not to treat, but to surrender the city. Should he neglect or refuse, proclamations will be issued directing the unarmed people to depart the city during the impending operations. Then will come the final scene.—the landing of the Marines and land forces, the shelling the forts, the breaching the walls, and the storm.

According to all precedent, Hong Kong is full of rushing rumours. "Yeh has been degraded." "Yeh has abandoned the city." "Yeh has asked to open negotiations." "Yeh will give up the city without a fight." "Yeh will die at his post." Yeh has mined all the gates, excavated all the streets, turned every highway into a tiger pit, putting upright spears at the bottom, and "Yeh has 22,000 men within the walls, and 200 guns on the fortification opposite the river." It will be hard if none of these opposing predictions should turn out to be like the event, that the Chinese government have been sending down troops from the north, and have been mounting guns upon the walls.

The two sister ships, the Imperatrice and the Imperatrice, are now both arrived, and have discharged their cargo of Marines in good health at Wantung, opposite the ruins of the Bogue forts. Captain Serrard Osborne, in the Furious, goes to Manill to bring up the last two of his squadron of gunboats. Captain Osborne has acquired great credit by the success with which he has brought all his chuch cockatries home—not to roost. To the Dodo belong the honors of the race; but they have all done well. Many were the adventures of these wee things, all flight and sting, in their passage through the waste of waters. The big ship of commerce, when they sighted one of these specks in mid ocean, took various ideas of the unusual sight. Some bore down towards it as a wreck offering of salvage money, and bore away again as they grew nearer, frightened at its vicious and piratical hull. Some recognized the little vixen thing and came near to see, digging ensign and offering sea luxuries. One Scotch ship fairly bolted at first view, and crowded all sail to escape when the terrible little cruiser manifested a desire for an interview. The commander of the gunboat had his reasons for a closer interchange of compliments; he made all sail, started in pursuit, then got up his steam, and a regular chase ensued. At last the Scotchman was overhauled, having led the gunboat some way out of her course. The officer boarded her in no very good humour, and asked why he had been led this dance, and whether the master did not know a pennant when he saw it?

"Eh," said the Scotchman, "I kenned vera well what ye war; but I thought sure enough ye'd just be in distress for something."

The Adelaide at this date has not been heard of, but as her consorts have arrived she may be daily expected. We are also entitled to expect a return of some 400 or 500 of the marines and troops lent to India. The authorities there have received the assistance they have obtained from the Chinese expedition, with less acknowledgment than might reasonably have been expected, and quite neglected to avail themselves of the moral influence which might have been drawn from the sudden arrival of Lord Elgin, with no inconsiderable nor inopportune force; but I suppose they will keep their promise and lend us back these men, the rather because there must soon be a glut of troops at Calcutta. They will probably arrive faster than they can be sent up the country.

In a few days, therefore, we may reasonably expect to have 700 guns and 7,000 men in these waters. Of the latter we shall probably be able to land, 4,000; but, alas, the great bulk of them will be blue jackets,—capital fellows afloat, but terrible stragglers ashore. Jack's habits all induce him to consider that going ashore means going upon a spree. Jack will help to take the city, or would take it single handed; but we must not trust 'im to hold it.

I believe I may now say that the Baron Gros has determined to co-operate in our enterprise. He has three frigates, two corvettes, and four gunboats here, and about 1,000 men, whereof he can land about 600 seamen. We have plenty of force to do the work single-handed, and some delay may possibly be occasioned by waiting until he can get his frigate, the Capricieuse, now, in dock at Shanghai, down southwards. So far, therefore, as actual assistance goes, perhaps we might as well have been alone; but in other points of view this co-operation must be satisfactory. What his casus belli may be I am not informed, and as it is no part of my business to speculate upon it I take it for granted that it is sufficient. It is clear, however, that it cannot be stronger than ours. The action of the French, therefore will justify in the eyes of Europe, the course which we are now taking, and, as the two squadrons will doubtless act cordially together, this will be another public proof of the friendship and common policy of the two nations.

It is equally well understood that the Americans are to retain their position of lookers on. Judging from the great draught of water of the Minnesota, even this "looking on" must be a very distant view.

The torpidity of the last five months, therefore, has changed to the bustle of preparation. The seamen are being drilled to act ashore, the 79th are being marched and counter-marched, targets are being set up in the secluded valleys of Hongkong, and the sharp ring of the rifle may be heard at early morn and at dewy eve. Every one who can smuggle himself on board a gunboat has been up the river to get a peep at the doomed city. Many who did not need his smuggling process have yielded to the same curiosity. General Ashburnham is said to be under orders for departure for India, and is about to exchange "Head Quarters House" for the Arc. Lord Elgin taking the house, and the General taking the steamer. If these orders should be imperative in their character, I apprehend that nothing can be done until he is gone, for it would probably be inexpedient that operations of magnitude, such as must occur after the taking of the city, should be originated by a General whose engagements elsewhere will not allow him to conduct to a close. The General, however, was loth to depart and not unnaturally so.—Colonels Wethrall and Packenham and Major Crealock have been hard at work for months arranging the plan of operations, and must be equally disappointed at having to leave their laboratory just at the moment of projection. Major Macdonald might reasonably expect to exercise his talents as Provost Marshall in the city of Canton, instead of joining his regiment in India when the hard fighting will probably be over.—But altered circumstances compel altered arrangements. Our staff officers and our doctors and our commissariat are ludicrously disproportionate to our present force and the public service must silence private hardships. When General Ashburnham, therefore, went up to Macao Fort and to the Fort of the Fatshan Creek, it was, as I suppose, only to take a Pisgah look at the promised land. It is said that he wants to see what the next mail may bring. Before this goes he may possibly have taken his departure.

Lord Elgin, accompanied by the French Secretary of Legation and Colonel Foley has also been up to Macao Fort, and taken a careful survey of the city from the top of the Pagoda. He called upon Baron Gros at the French anchorage at Castle Peak Bay and held long converse. The Chinese, who profess to be quite convinced that all this "bobbery" terms their word, is only to frighten them, and who will repent "Englishmen no can take Canton" are quite certain that "Number one Mandarin" only went up to try and open negotiations with Yeh.

I also have been cruising about in these waters. After about four months absence it was pleasant to revisit once tranquilly than upon a former occasion the fort on the Fatshan creek, now called "Seymour Fort," and to look again upon the city from the Macao Pagoda. I cannot detect any alteration in the defences of the city since I was last there. The Shamech forts at the end of the three-mile reach, still look ruinous. Gough Fort seems to be surrounded by rather fewer tents than when I last saw it. All the traps and pitfalls are probably completed. There is, however, a closer interest now in bringing a powerful glass to bear upon the heights which must so soon be won by British daring, and in examining the ground along which our forces must proceed. It is broken ground, capital skirmishing ground, but very difficult for the transport of guns. Mr. Power, who now conducts the Commissariat Department, has organized a corps of 700 coolies—"Hakkas," or men drawn from a mountain district which has always had little respect for Mandarin authority. They look very well when they are parading at Hongkong, and they work very well, but whether these fellows will drag field-pieces up over those inequalities in face of the fire from the forts is yet to be seen. I believe it is not proposed to bring this novel transport corps actually under fire, but the question is at what distance they will take fright.

I passed also by Whampoa, which has not been seen except by the Earl and the General and their projecting gunboats since the commencement of the war; I beg pardon, I mean since the commencement of the misunderstanding between the local authorities at Canton and her Majesty's civil and military officers there. I only know by description how populous and busy the place once was, how thronged by boats, how crowded by shipping, how echoing with drunken shouts, how rife with fierce debauchery. The town is apparently very moral now. There is scarcely a boat on the river. The docks are all destroyed and the blocks of granite emulate the eccentricity of the blocks at the Bogue forts.—Many of the wooden houses that advance upon piles into the river are losing their perpendicular and leaning forwards like a drunken man posing himself; some are already down; all look ruinous and desolate. Here and there a few Chinese were gathered together to stare at us as we passed, but they were more haggard than any Chinaman I have ever seen. They were probably the remnons of races locally extinct.

I passed also by the French anchorage, and had some communication with their fleet. This is a beautiful spot in this clear cool weather, and I dare say they derive immense satisfaction in perforating the hill in their ball practice, and setting fire to the brushwood by their shell practice. But still I don't quite wonder that they should be ready to fight anybody in any cause to get a little distraction. The Baron's suite are all Marquises and Counts, and grand seigneurs of high degree, who had come out with the idea of a sort of Royal progress to Pekin. They have been six months at sea, cooped up in the Audacieuse, and are still in their floating prison. One of the officers said to me, "We get up every morning at daylight because their is such a deuce of a noise (tapage d'enfer) with washing the deck that no one can sleep all day long, as he would wish, and we see always that same sea and those same rocks, and that everlasting sugarloaf his—ce n'est pas gai. Now and then we have our distraction. The Admiral, who is very amiable, allows us occasionally a speculate.—But the sailors only play one piece, and the women are represented by two broad-chested mariners. One of them tells us in the course of the dialogue, in a male bass voice, Holos! tous voyez que je suis belle.—Comme c'est malheureux d'etre belle! —Ce n'est pas amusant. I hope their friends in Paris will cease to envy them, and sympathize with their sufferings.

My letters from the North tell me that the Chinese have just issued an impertinent proclamation, warning the barbarians not to venture into the interior, and declaring that even if they should not create disturbances there, punishment will await them. It is just as well that I made my survey of Hangchau before this survey appeared, for nobody doubts the power of the Mandarins to incite the population to force on "a disturbance" with the most peaceable Europeans.

Count Putiatin is back in Shanghai. He has made a new treaty in Japan, and it seems that the terms are liberal, shutting a tendency on the part of the Japanese to throw over exclusiveness. Russia has been granted land to build Government storehouses, and the Japanese have bought several European merchant ships. They have heard of Queen Victoria's gift to the Emperor, and are anxiously looking for her arrival. She is now being ornamented in Hong Kong harbor, but she will disappoint the Japanese. She is neither a ship of war nor a pleasure yacht, and is specially ill adapted for the habits of the people for whom she is destined. The Dutch naval officers have been to see her, and chuckle at the little respect she will obtain for British naval architecture.

I learn from the same source that Pekin is nearly in a state of famine. Rice is said to cost 300 cash (about 1s 6d) a-pound. The Russian Plenipotentiary and the American Commodore were about leaving for Hong Kong.

The same letters tell me of the death of Mr. Beale, one the Medici of Shanghai.—He had accumulated an enormous fortune without contracting the limits of a most lavish expenditure. He had just resolved to return home. I was his guest for some time at Shanghai, and was indebted to him for much information. He had discussed with me his plans for his new career in England, and his influence would have been great upon all questions relating to China. But while he was gathering in the threads of his multifarious operations, Death put his hand upon him. He died delirious, pointing out the headlands and cities he saw in his voyage towards England. Well, Pascal says, "La mort est plus assee a supporter sans penser que la pensee de la mort sans peril." So perhaps he was happy in his death. I am told also by the same mail of the death of a young and honest-hearted missionary at Ningpo, with whom I had had much converse. It is frightful to look back upon the number of youthful and energetic men whom I have known intimately during my sojourn in the East, and who have succumbed in this climate.

A Delicate Subject.

Since the days of good Queen Anne, when Will Honeycomb used to devote an occasional essay in the Spectator to the petticoat, that delicate subject has been in too great reverence to be made the subject of newspaper discussion. Whether it has been owing to a refinement of feeling or a lack of gallantry, that the petticoat has been held in sacred reserve, we will not pretend to decide, but suddenly it has been dragged ruthlessly before the public gaze again, and, we wish we could add, with as much gallantry and easy grace as were displayed by jovial Dick Steele when he handled the subject.

Our countrywoman, the lady of Sir Gore Ouseley, at Washington, has been the cause of this disturbance. She has startled the politicians at our national capital, and "fluttered the Volscians" of the pave generally, by displaying a crimson petticoat as she walked the streets, of course not intentionally, but by that graceful and fascinating lifting of the robe, which vain Frenchmen have imagined no lady could ever do properly anywhere out of Paris. The little bit of red displayed in this manner has had the effect upon the masculine public which that fiery color is supposed to produce upon the passions of an excited bull. The red petticoat has become the current theme of conversation, and Broadway, ere long, will probably have a fiery streak running along the pavement, as though a procession of cardinals were going along in full sacerdotal costume.

Well, we must yield to the dominant fashion, whether it be a red petticoat or a green umbrella, but we must say that a softer and milder tint would be more becoming for Summer, let the case be as it may in Winter. We have an indistinct recollection of having once enjoyed a transient glimpse of an embroidered petticoat of snowy whiteness, which we caught an involuntary sight of as a stately lady displayed one day as she lifted her brocaded robe in stepping across Broadway, to prevent the hem of her dress coming in contact with the muddy pavement. We have not the boldness to oppose our humble opinion to a newly introduced fashion, but we will venture timidly to intimate that the snowy purity of dimity or muslin is much more likely to make a lasting impression on the masculine heart than the most brilliant scarlet that ever hung about feminine ankles.

But it is said that Queen Victoria wore the red petticoat when she was last at her palace of Balmoral in the Highlands. Of course we have not another word to say on the subject. If the Queen wore the crimson jupe in Scotland what better reason could be desired as an apology for our ladies wearing it in Broadway?—N. Y. Times.

☞The trial of John B. Robertson, late Cashier of the Eagle Bank, Rochester, on a charge of attempting to poison his wife, excites great interest in that vicinity, and throughout the United States. The parties are well known in Rochester, and have hitherto occupied a very respectable position. The crime charged against Mr. Robertson is an attempt to enlist a physician in Rochester, Dr. Joseph A. Biegler, in a conspiracy to make away with Mrs. Robertson, by means of the administration of a series of slow poisons. The Dr. Biegler in question is a son of the Buffalo physician who was recently sentenced to State Prison for causing the death of a young girl by producing an abortion. The elder Biegler's troubles, as the story goes, claimed the sympathy of Robertson, who has visited him at Auburn since his conviction to obtain medical advice for his wife. The younger Biegler has since become the family physician of Robertson, and becomes the principal witness for the prosecution on the present trial—charging Robertson with an attempt to induce him to administer poisons to his wife, and with using such language as the following in reference to the lady, viz: "I want the cause of all my troubles and this hell upon earth removed from existence." Biegler states that the proposal startled him, but that he promised to "think of it," and that by means of concealed witnesses, during successive interviews with Robertson, succeeded in establishing a chain of evidence against him.—This is the case for the prosecution. The younger Dr. Biegler is the prime mover in the affair, and is the first and principal witness in the case. It will be observed that the charge hinges upon these unhappy relations existing between Mr. Robertson and his wife, and his alleged desire to terminate domestic difficulties. On the other side it is proper to state that the affair is looked upon by a large class of persons in Rochester as an extraordinary case of conspiracy—whether for the purpose of injuring Robertson's reputation to gratify the enmity of certain parties, or to bring the elder Biegler out of State Prison on the plea that his evidence is indispensable, are questions which remain to be settled by future developments.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR: The underwritten Communication which as you will see is a continuation of what I lately introduced to the people of Peterboro' through the columns of the Peterborough Review, was offered to the editor of that journal, but as he wanted to submit it to his superiors before he could give me an answer to my request to have it published, I declined his terms, not wishing to put myself in the hands of an editor who has neither will nor power to be independent, and do what he feels right; and as I share in the general sentiment of reliance expressed by the people towards you in the conduct of your journal, I appeal with confidence to your desire to see justice done, and give me the privilege the less honorable editor of the Review has denied me.

I am Sir,
Yours respectfully,
J. T. HENTHORN.

Peterboro, Jan 30, 1858.

MR. EDITOR:—I see in your last issue that Mr. Wm. Cumming comes out pleading his innocence, and says he never charged me with stealing lumber from the Corporation, but only with using it, just before his eyes; he does not tell you that he saw me take it from Dr. Burnham's either on a team or on my back; he does not tell you anybody else saw me take the mighty heap of lumber, and then he goes on to tell you a long yarn about what Mr. Henthorn said about getting two loads of lumber and him going to Mr. Ledgate and asking him about my lumber, and then goes to the Mayor and tells him a cock-and-bull story, but all to no purpose. He does not tell you that Mr. Ledgate delivered to me last year upwards of 40,000 feet of lumber. He does not tell you that Mr. Austin delivered a large quantity of lumber, as also did Mr. Kelly of Mud Lake. Now, Sir, I tell you, our Bailiff, Mr. Cumming is the greatest rogue of the two, because, from the fact of his being a paid servant of the Council he ought to have taken me up or any body else for depriving the Corporation of such a large quantity of lumber as he stated that I took from them in the presence of several witnesses on the public streets and in the Council. I can tell Mr. Cumming that his days are about at an end in this town. I would like to ask Mr. Cumming how many plank he gave to Mr. James Harvey, one of our present Councillors, to crib around his cellar windows on Hunter Street last Summer, both Scotch. The reason why Cumming is so mad at me is that I always voted in the Council against the following large salaries given him.

In my last I stated that the pickings of our Town Bailiff, Mr. Cumming, amounted to one year to something like £300. Perhaps, Sir, it would not be amiss to give it to you and your numerous readers in detail:

Salary voted to him by the Council..	£90	0	0
Fees from the Mayor's Court.....	36	0	0
Hay Weighing.....	54	12	0
Horse and cart on street, 8 months, 3s 9d per day.....	70	13	0
Putting drunkards to bed 5s per head.	25	0	0
A free house on Market Square.....	30	0	0
5s per head over-charge on tax-payers	50	0	0
Other jobs, such as landlord's vagrants	12	10	0
Fixing up Mr. Fenerty's office.....	25	0	0

This appears to be one of the best offices in the County. Now, sir, the above statement I shall prove to your satisfaction, also to the satisfaction of the tax-payers of the town, who I think will not relish it very well. I do assure you, sir, it is not now I came to know this diabolical outrage committed on the Town by our Bailiff, Wm. Cumming. During my long stay in the Council I often tried to improve it, and made use of it when speaking in the Council, but I was always voted down because Cumming was a good fellow and always had money when our Treasurer had none. To tell you the truth of it, our Treasurer had only the name and our Bailiff had all the profits.

Sir, it is well known to both Council and Town that Cummings' salary is fixed at £90 per year and that he is not entitled to another penny for his services. Does he deny that he receives from the Mayor's Court 6s 3d on every case tried before the Mayor. You may ask the question how I came to know this. I was in the Clerk's office a few days ago when Mr. John Williamson was being tried before the Mayor for his chimney being on fire, when he was fined 5s, and 16s 3d costs when Mr. Cumming) claimed 6s 3d, to which the Mayor at once agreed. Then I turned over to the Town Records and found there about 80 cases, and in proportion to the charge made in my presence, Cumming would receive £25 per year from it. Will Mr. Cumming deny that he has received from hay weighing alone £54 13s 9d, while there never was an order on the books for any such donation to him? How long will the already over-burdened tax-payers of this Town stand this high-handed robbery? (as I cannot find in the whole dictionary a milder term for it.) Does our very righteous Bailiff pretend to deny that he had a horse and cart on the streets for seven months in the name of his little Clerk, Andrew Cathcart, and this scheme was only to hide the outrageous charges made by Cumming & Co. against the Corporation. I think, Sir, that you and your readers will agree with me on this point, that last Summer was one of the wettest Summers that has been for the last twenty years and that neither man or beast could stand out of doors to make fair time, or anywhere near it, but lo and behold! here is the neat time of Cumming & Co.'s bob-tail nag, (a hardy fellow indeed) and his seven year old driver who could stand rain, hail, thunder and lightning better than any other nag in Town, but if he does stand all this hardship we must make the Town pay for it. "Come Andy," says Cumming, "you mark down the days he works in every month, and don't make any half-days as they are hard to reckon you know." When will I begin to charge from? asks Andy, when Cummings, in his usually good-natured manner, replies, "from the 1st of June, of course." The following is a true statement of the pay list of Cumming & Co.:

June,	24½	(at 8s 9d pr. day)	11	3	1½
July,	24½	"	10	12	3
August,	24½	"	10	16	0
September,	25	"	10	18	9
October,	24½	"	10	12	2
November,	21	"	9	3	9
December,—not one day at all—but
Andy bulks it by order of his boss at	7	6	6½
		To	13	0

I presume, Sir, that your readers will remember the weather we had in the last mentioned month.

Mr. Cumming says himself that he makes £29 per year by putting drunkards to bed. He laughs at the Council and says he can make £25 per year in Mr. Fraser's office. Then, Sir, you are aware that he has a house on the Market Square, which, with a little repair, would rent for £50 per year.

Now, Sir, this is my last charge at this time against Mr Cumming, but not the least, I assure you. Last year when the taxes were about to be collected, Mr. Cumming sits quietly down in his office and calls upon Constable Woods to go around the several wards and warn the people to come to Mr. Cummings' office and pay their taxes. This call the people obeyed at once, and to their great astonishment Cumming had the hardihood to charge them 5s over and above their lawful tax and termed it part of his fees, and any one who disputed it he threatened that he would go to their houses and shanties and drag out everything they had and sell it on the streets,—(very hard indeed.)

Another small charge against Cumming and I am done. I do not know whether the people will take notice of it or not, but I assure you the Government will not wink at it; or any other unjustifiable conduct, as the fact that a common Constable, like Cumming, to keep a Bible in his office and swear innocent people on it to gratify his own foolish ambition. I sincerely hope that our new Council will try and reform all these crying evils and abuses that have long prevailed in our Council.

Mr. Editor, I hope you will excuse me for such a long article, but I do justice to the people of this town to show up Cumming in his true light. I could not make it shorter and do him justice. No more at present,

I remain,
Your obedient Servant,
J. T. HENTHORN.

The Flag of England.

Gaily and gallantly,
O'er the sea,
Floateth the standard,
Unfurled to the breeze,
High and exalted,
It rides o'er the wave,
Protected and honored,
By Britons so brave.

Freely and glorious,
High in the air;
To sully its glory,
The bravest don't dare:
That standard of freedom,
Floats o'er the sea,
The emblem of Britain,
That home of the free.

That time-honoured standard,
Has long been unfurled,
The freeman's protector,
All o'er the world;
The pride of the Briton,
The hope of our race;
It bears an inscription,
That cannot efface.

Bright on its folds,
And illumed by the sun,
Is "Freedom to all,
And to every one;"
The bond and the free,
And the dark-colored slave;
Have reason to bless,
That flag of the brave.

Gaily and gallantly,
O'er the sea float,
The Englishman's pride,
In glory doth roam.
And this banner of liberty
Every shall wave,
The guard of the weak,
And the pride of the brave.

The Death of Gen. Havelock.

Alas! can it be true,
That Havelock is no more,
That he the great, the brave,
Has crossed death's fatal shore;
That he the good, the wise and brave,
Lies cold but glorious in his grave?

It is, for echo tells it,
Along the electric wire,
And sad the tidings sound,
To every British sire;
To hear that Havelock, Britain's boast,
Is thus untimely early lost.

Those tidings make tears flow,
Around each social hearth;
And with sorrow is the scene,
That erst did ring with mirth;
And Britain's sons in sadness weep,
Oer Havelock in death asleep.

No fairy's tears they deep,
Their grief is too severe—
His was the sterling worth,
Which wrings from souls the tear;
Soon Britains lofty crown-head,
Weeps anguish for such mighty dead;
For long like jewel hid,
Amidst obscuring clay
Good Havelock obscurely lived,
None did him honor pay;
'Twas in the hour of Britain's need,
His lustre shone in word and deed.

His country saw with greatful gaze,
His star expand to day,
And crush the savage Sepoy race,
Who had renounced her sway;
And felt an honor in his name,
His deeds, her safety and her fame.

His is the victor's crown,
The patriot's wreath his praise,
His name his country's boast,
And his the poets lays;
While Piety can truly say,
"'Twas He he loved, and I his way."

No foeman laid him low,
Or stained his brow with gore,
Heaven kept him free from harm,
He safe his laurels bore;
By Grace or crime alike unstained,
As both by worth and valour gained.

'Twas only when his fame,
Wide as the world had spread,
And saved Hindostan was
Then he mixed with the dead;
As if he wished reward to shun,
Suffered because of duty done.

Britannia mourns his loss,
Attired in sorrow's dress,
And drops the burning tear,
She could not well do less;
For such as him she few can spare,
So lovely, useful, and so rare.

That reach my fellow-men,
Philantrophy my soul inspires,
To lift my feeble pen,
Not to prescribe a remedy,
Such would be vain to try;
My only aim shall be to prove,
Hard times is all the cry

Though not a few of business men,
Upon the past may muse;
Their own ambition fed the flame—
Adversity causes—
Prosperity with them's eclipsed,
Their brightest hopes is marred;
The hammer of the mechanic,
Tells them the times is hard.

When times was good and markets high,
Our farmers cut a dash;
Some bought on credit, rode on springs,
But now they feel the lash;
Their notes are due, their money's done,
Their debts unpaid must lie;
They won't accept the market price,
That now is passing by.

When trade was brisk, and wages good,

PATENT

ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all externess of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. ITS BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices, Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. ITS DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analogous objects of decoration.

Sixth. ITS CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHE

The Defence of Lucknow.

No. 1.

FROM BRIGADIER INGLIS, COMMANDING GARRISON OF LUCKNOW, TO THE SECRETARY TO GOVERNMENT, MILITARY DEPARTMENT. CALCUTTA. DATED LUCKNOW, Sept. 26, 1857.

Sir,—In consequence of the very deeply-to-be-lamented death of Brigadier-General Sir H. M. Lawrence, K. C. B., late in command of the Oude Field Force, the duty of narrating the military events which have occurred at Lucknow since the 29th of June last has devolved upon myself.

On the evening of that day several reports reached Sir Henry Lawrence that the Rebel Army in no very considerable force, would march from Chinhut (a small village about 8 miles distant on the road to Fyzabad) on Lucknow on the following morning, and the late Brigadier-General therefore determined to make a strong reconnaisance in that direction, with the view, if possible, of meeting the force at a disadvantage, either at its entrance into the suburbs of the city, or at the bridge across the Gokral, which is a small stream intercepting the Fyzabad road, about half-way between Lucknow and Chinhut.

The force destined for this service, and which was composed as follows, moved out at 6 A. M. on the morning of the 30th June:—

Artillery.—4 guns of No. 1 Horse Light Field Battery, 4 ditto of No. 2 Oude Field Battery, 2 ditto of No. 3 ditto, and an 8-inch howitzer.

Cavalry.—Troops of Volunteer Cavalry, and 120 troopers of detachments belonging to 1st, 2d, and 3rd Regiments of Oude Irregular Cavalry.

Infantry.—300 of Her Majesty's 32d, 150 19th Native Infantry, 60 48th Native Infantry, 20 71st Native Infantry, (Sikhs.)

The troops, misled by the reports of wayfarers—who stated that there were few or no men between Lucknow and Chinhut—proceeded somewhat further than had been originally intended, and suddenly fell in with the enemy, who had up to that time eluded the vigilance of the advanced guard by concealing themselves behind a long line of trees in overwhelming numbers. The European force and the howitzer, with the Native Infantry, held the foe in check for some time, and had the six guns of the Oude Artillery been faithful, and the Sikh Cavalry shown a better front, the day would have been won in spite of an immense disparity in numbers. But the Oude artillerymen and drivers were traitors. They overturned the guns into ditches, cut the traces of their horses, and abandoned them, regardless of the remonstrances and exertions of their own officers, and of those of Sir Henry Lawrence's staff, headed by the Brigadier General in person, who himself drew his sword upon these rebels. Every effort to induce them to stand having proved ineffectual, the force, exposed to a vastly superior fire of artillery and completely outflanked on both sides by an overpowering body of infantry and cavalry, which actually got into our rear, was compelled to retire with the loss of three pieces of artillery, which fell into the hands of the enemy in consequence of the rank treachery of the Oude gunners, and with a very grievous list of killed and wounded. The heat was dreadful, the gun ammunition was expended, and the almost total want of cavalry to protect our rear made our retreat most disatrous.

All the officers behaved well, and the exertions of the small body of volunteer cavalry, only 40 in number, under Capt. Radcliffe, 7th Light Cavalry, were most praiseworthy. Sir Henry Lawrence subsequently conveyed his thanks to myself, who had at his request accompanied him upon this occasion, Colonel Case being in command of Her Majesty's 32nd. He also expressed his approbation of the way in which his staff—Captain Wilson, Officiating Deputy Assistant-Adjutant-General; Lieut. James, Sub-Assistant-Commissary-General; Capt. Edgell, Officiating Military Secretary; and Mr. Couper, C. S.; the last of whom had acted as Sir Henry Lawrence's aid-de-camp from the commencement of this disturbance—had conducted themselves throughout the arduous day. Sir Henry further particularly mentioned that he would bring the gallant conduct of Captain Radcliffe and of Lieutenant Bonham, of the Artillery (who worked the howitzer successfully until incapacitated by a wound,) to the prominent notice of the Government of India. The manner in which Lieutenant Birch, 71st Native Infantry, cleared the village with a party of Sikh skirmishers also elicited the admiration of the Brigadier-General. The conduct of Lieut. Hardinge, who, with his handful of horse, covered the retreat of the rear-guard, was extolled by Sir Henry, who expressed his intention of mentioning the services of this gallant officer to his Lordship in Council. Lieutenant-Colonel Case, who commanded Her Majesty's 32nd Regiment, was mortally wounded, while gallantly leading on his men. The service had not a more deserving officer.—The command devolved on Capt. Stevens, who also received a death wound shortly afterwards. The command then fell to Captain Mansfield, who has since died of cholera. A list of the casualties on this occasion accompanies the despatch.

It remains to report the siege operations.

It will be in the recollection of his Lordship in Council that it was the original intention of Sir Henry Lawrence to occupy, not only the Residency, but also the fort called Muchhee Bhowun, an old, dilapidated edifice, which had been hastily repaired for the occasion, though the defences were even at the very last moment very far from complete, and were moreover, commanded by many houses in the city. The situation of the Muchee Bhowun with regard to the Residency, has already been described to the Government of India.

The untoward event of the 30th of June so far diminished our whole available force that we had not a sufficient number of men remaining to occupy both positions. The Brigadier-General therefore, on the evening of the 1st of July, signalled to the garrison of the Muchhee Bhowun to evacuate and blow up that fortress in the course of the night. The orders were ably carried out and at 12 P. M. the force marched into the Residency with their guns and treasure, without the loss of a man; and shortly afterwards the explosion of 240 barrels of gunpowder, and 6,000,000 ball cartridges, which were lying in the magazine announced to Sir Henry Lawrence and his officers, who were anxiously waiting the report, the complete destruction of that post and all that it contained. If it had not been for this wise and strategic measure, no member of the Lucknow garrison, in all probability, would have survived to tell the tale; for, as has already been stated, the Muchhee Bhowun was commanded from other parts of the town, and was indifferently provided with heavy artillery ammunition, while the difficulty, suffering, and loss which the Residency garrison, even with the reinforcement thus obtained from the Muchhee Bhowun, has undergone in holding the position, are sufficient to show that if the original intention of holding both posts had been adhered to, both would have inevitably fallen.

It is now my very painful duty to relate the calamity which befel us at the commencement of the siege. On the 1st of July an 8-inch shell burst in the room in the Residency in which Sir H. Lawrence was sitting. The missile burst between him and Mr. Couper, close to both, but without injury to either. The whole of his staff implored Sir Henry to take up other quarters, as the Residency had then become the special target for the round shot and shell of the enemy. This, however, he jestingly declined to do, observing that another shell would certainly never be pitched into that small room. But Providence had ordained otherwise, for on the very next day he was mortally wounded by the fragment of another shell which burst in the same room, exactly at the same spot. Captain Wilson, Deputy Assistant Adjutant General, received a contusion at the same time.

The late lamented Sir H. Lawrence, knowing that his last hour was rapidly approaching, directed me to assume command of the troops, and appointed Major Banks to succeed him in the office of chief commissioner. He lingered in great agony till the morning of the 4th of July, when he expired, and the Government was thereby deprived, if I may venture to say so, of the services of a distinguished statesman and a most gallant soldier. Few men have ever possessed the power which he enjoyed of winning the hearts of all those with whom he came in contact, and thus insuring the warmest and most zealous devotion for himself and the Government which he served. The successful defence of the position has been, under Providence, solely attributable to the foresight he evinced in the timely commencement of the necessary operations, and the great skill and untiring personal activity which he exhibited in carrying them into effect. All ranks possessed such confidence in his judgment and his fertility of resource that the news of his fall was received throughout the camp with feelings of consternation only second to the grief which was inspired in the hearts of all by the loss of a public benefactor and a warm personal friend. Feeling as keenly and as gratefully as I do the obligations that the whole of us are under to this great and good man, I trust the Government of India will pardon me for having attempted, however imperfectly, to pourtray him. In him every good and deserving soldier lost a friend and a chief capable of discriminating and ever on the alert to reward merit, no matter how humble the sphere in which it was exhibited.

The garrison had scarcely recovered the shock which it had sustained in the loss of its revered and beloved General, when it had to mourn the death of that able and respected officer, Major Bank, the officiating chief commissioner, who received a bullet through his head while examining a critical outpost on the 21st of July and died without a groan.

The description of our position and the state of our defences when the siege began are so fully set forth in the accompanying memorandum furnished by the garrison engineer that I shall content myself with bringing to the notice of his Lordship in Council the fact that when the blockade was commenced only two of our batteries were completed, part of the defences were yet in an unfinished condition, and the buildings in the immediate vicinity, which gave cover to the enemy were only very partially cleared away. Indeed, our heaviest losses have been caused by the fire from the enemy's sharpshooters, stationed in the adjoining mosques and houses of the native nobility, the necessity of destroying which had been repeatedly drawn to the attention of Sir Henry by the staff of Engineers; but his invariable reply was "spare the holy places, and private property, too, as far as possible;" and we have consequently suffered very severely from our very tenderness to the religious prejudices and respect to the rights of our rebellious citizens and soldiery. As soon as the enemy had thoroughly completed the investment of the Residency they occupied these houses, some of which were within easy pistol shot of our barricades, in immense force, and rapidly made loopholes on those sides which bore on our post, from which they kept up a terrific and incessant fire day and night, which caused many casualties, as there could not have been less than 8,000 men firing at one time into our position. Moreover, there has been no place in the whole of our works that could be considered safe, for several of the sick and wounded who were lying in the Banqueting-hall, which had been turned into an hospital, were killed in the very centre of the building, and the widow of Lieutenant Dorin and other women and children were shot dead in rooms into which it had not been deemed possible that a bullet could penetrate. Neither were the enemy idle in erecting batteries. They soon had from 20 to 25 guns in position, some of them of very large calibre. These were planted all round our post at small distances, some being actually within 20 yards of our defences, but in places where our own heavy guns could not reply to them; while the perseverance and ingenuity of the enemy in erecting barricades in front of and around their guns in a very short time rendered all attempts to silence them by musketry entirely unavailing. Neither could they be effectually silenced by shells, by reason of their extreme proximity to our position, and because, moreover, the enemy had recourse to digging very narrow trenches about eight feet in depth in rear of each gun, in which the men lay while their shells were flying, and which so effectually concealed them, even while working the guns, that our baffled sharpshooters could only see their hands while in the act of loading.

The enemy contented themselves with keeping up their incessant fire of cannon and musketry until the 20th of July, on which day, at 10 a. m., they assembled in very great force all around our position, and exploded a heavy mine inside our outer line of defence at the Water-gate. The mine, however, which was close to the Redan, and apparently sprung with the intention of destroying that battery, did no harm. But as soon as the smoke cleared away the enemy boldly advanced under cover of a tremendous fire of cannon and musketry, with the object of storming the Redan.—But they were received with such a heavy fire that after a short struggle they fell back with much loss. A strong column advanced at the same time to attack Innes's post, and came to within ten yards of the palisades, affording to Lieutenant Loughnan, 13th Native Infantry, who commanded the position, and his brave garrison, composed of gentlemen of the uncovenanted service, a few of her Majesty's 32nd Foot, and of the 13th Native Infantry, an opportunity of distinguishing themselves, which they were not slow to avail themselves of, and the enemy were driven back with great slaughter. The insurgents made minor attacks at almost every outpost, but were invariably defeated, and at 2 p. m. they ceased their attempts to storm the place, although their musketry fire and cannonading continued to harass us unceasingly as usual. Matters proceeded in this manner until the 10th of August, when the enemy made another assault, having previously sprung a mine close to the Brigade Mess, which entirely destroyed our defences for the space of 20 feet, and blew in a great portion of the outside wall of the house of Mr. Schilling's garrison. On the dust clearing away a breach appeared, through which a regiment could have advanced in perfect order, and a few of the enemy came on with the utmost determination, but were met with such a withering flank fire of musketry from the officers and men holding the top of the Brigade Mess that the beat a speedy retreat, leaving the most adventurous of their numbers lying on the crest of the beach. While the operation was going on another large body advanced on the Cawnpore Battery, and succeeded in locating themselves for a few minutes in the ditch. They were, however, dislodged by hand grenades. At Captain Anderson's post they also came boldly forward with scaling ladders, which they planted against the wall; but here, as elsewhere, they were met by the most indomitable resolution, and the leaders being slain, the rest fled, leaving the ladders, and retreated to their batteries and loop-holed defences, whence they kept up for the rest of the day an unusually heavy cannonade and musketry fire. On the 18th of August, the enemy sprang another mine in front of the Sikh lines with very fatal effect. Capt. Orr (unattached), Lieutenants Mecham and Soppitt, who commanded the small body of drummers commanding the garrison, were blown into the air; but providentially returned to earth with no further injury than a severe shaking. The garrison, however, were not so fortunate. No less than 11 men were buried alive under the ruins, whence it was impossible to extricate them owing to the tremendous fire kept up by the enemy from houses situated not ten yards in front of the breach. The explosion was followed by a general assault of a less determined nature than the two former, and the enemy were consequently repulsed without much difficulty. But they succeeded, under cover of the breach, in establishing themselves in one of the houses in our position, from which they were driven in the evening by the bayonets of Her Majesty's 32nd and 84th foot. On the 5th of September, the enemy made their last serious assault. Having exploded a large mine a few feet short of the bastion of the 18-pounder gun in Major Apthorp's post, they advanced with large heavy scaling ladders, which they planted against the wall, and mounted, thereby gaining for an instant the embrasure of a gun. They were, however, speedily driven back with loss by hand grenades and musketry.

A few minutes subsequently, they sprang another mine close to the Brigade Mess, and advanced boldly; but soon the corpses strewn in the garden in front of the post bore testimony to the fatal accuracy of the rifle and musketry fire of the gallant members of that garrison, and the enemy fled ignominiously, leaving their leader—a fine-looking old native officer among the slain. At other posts, they made similar attacks, but with less resolution, and everywhere with the same want of success. Their loss upon this day must have been very heavy, as they came on with much determination, and at night they were seen bearing large numbers of their killed and wounded over the bridges in the direction of the cantonments. The above is a faint description of the four great struggles which have occurred during this protracted season of exertion, exposure, and suffering. His Lordship in Council will perceive that the enemy always commenced his attacks by the explosion of a mine—a species of offensive warfare for the exercise of which our position was unfortunately peculiarly situated, and, had it not been for the most untiring vigilance on our part in watching and blowing up their mines before they were completed, the assaults would probably have been much more numerous, and might, perhaps, have ended in the capture of the place. But by countermining in all directions, we succeeded in detecting and destroying no less than six of the enemy's subterraneous advances toward important positions, two of which operations were eminently successful, as on one occasion not less than eighty were blown into the air, and twenty of them suffered a similar fate on the second explosion. The labor, however, which devolved upon us in making these countermines, in the absence of a body of skilled miners, was very heavy.—The Right Hon. the Governor General in Council will feel that it would be impossible to crowd within the limits of a despatch even the principal events, much more the individual acts of gallantry, which have marked this protracted struggle. But I can conscientiously declare my conviction that few troops have ever undergone greater hardships, exposed as they have been to a never-ceasing musketry-fire and cannonade. They have also experienced the alternate vicissitudes of extreme wet and of intense heat, and that too with very insufficient shelter from either, and in many places without any shelter at all. In addition to our having to repel real attacks, they have been exposed night and day to the hardly less harassing false alarms which the enemy have been constantly raising.—The insurgents have frequently fired very heavily, sounded the advance, and shouted for several hours together, though not a man could be seen, with the view, of course, of harrassing our small and exhausted force, in which object they succeeded, for no part has been strong enough to allow of a portion only of the garrison being prepared, in the event of a false attack being turned into a real one; all, therefore, had to stand to their arms, and to remain at their posts until the demonstration had ceased; and such attacks were of almost nightly occurrence. The whole of the officers and men have been on duty during the 78 days which the siege had lasted up to the arrival of Sir J. Outram, G. C. B. In addition to this incessant military duty, the force has been nightly employed in repairing defences, in moving guns, in burying dead animals, in conveying ammunition and commissariat stores from one place to another, and in other fatigue duties too numerous and too trivial to enumerate here. I feel, however that any words of mine will fail to convey any adequate idea of what our fatigue and labours have been—labours in which all ranks and all classes, civilians, officers and soldiers, have all borne an equally noble part. All have together descended into the mine, and have together handled the shovel for the interment of the putrid bullocks, and all, accoutred with musket and bayonet, have relieved each other on sentry without regard to distinction of rank, civil or military. Notwithstanding all these hardships, the garrison has made no less than five sorties, in which they spiked two of the enemy's heaviest guns, and blew up several of the houses from which they kept their most harrassing fire. Owing to the extreme paucity of our numbers, each man was made to feel that on his own individual efforts alone depended in no small measure the safety of the entire position. This conscientiousness incited every soldier, officer and man, to defend the post assigned to him with such desperate tenacity, and fight for the lives which Providence had entrusted to his care with such dauntless determination, that the enemy, despite their constant attacks, their heavy mines, their overwhelming numbers, and their incessant fire, could never succeed in gaining one single inch of ground within the bounds of this struggling position, which was so feebly fortified that had they once obtained a footing in any of the outposts the whole place must inevitably have fallen.

If further proof be wanting of the desperate nature of the struggle which we have, under God's blessing, so long and so successfully waged, I would point to the roofless and ruined houses, to the crumbled walls, to the exploded mines, to the open breaches, to the shattered and disabled guns and defences, and lastly, to the long and melancholy list of the brave and devoted officers and men who have fallen.—These silent witnesses bear sad and solemn testimony to the way in which this feeble position has been defended. During the early part of these vicissitudes we were left without any information whatever regarding the posture of affairs outside. An occasional spy did indeed come with the object of inducing our Sepoys and servants to desert; but the intelligence derived from such sources was, of course, entirely untrustworthy. We sent our messengers daily calling for aid and asking for information, none of whom ever returned until the 28th day of the siege, when a pensioner named Ungud came back with a letter from General Havelock's camp, informing us that they were advancing with a force sufficient to bear down all opposition, and would be with us in five or six days. A messenger was immediately despatched, requesting that on the evening of their arrival on the outskirts of the city, two rockets might be sent up, in order that we might take the necessary measures for assisting them while forcing their way in. The 6th day, however, expired, and they came not; but for many evenings after officers and men watched for the ascension of the expected rockets, with hopes such as make the heart sick. We knew not then, nor did we learn until the 29th of August (or 35 days later), that the relieving force, after having fought most nobly to effect our deliverance, had been obliged to fall back for reinforcements; and this was the last communication we received until two days before the arrival of Sir James Outram, on the 25th of September.

Besides heavy visitations of cholera and small-pox, we have also had to contend against a sickness which has almost universally pervaded the garrison. Commencing with a very painful eruption it had merged into a low fever, combined with diarrhœa; and, although few or no men have actually died from its effects, it leaves behind a weakness and lassitude which, in the absence of all material sustenance, save coarse beef and still coarser flour, none have been able entirely to get over. The mortality among the women and children, and especially among the latter, from these diseases and from other causes, has been perhaps the most painful characteristic of the siege.—The want of native servants has also been a source of much privation. Owing to the suddenness with which we were besieged, many of these people who might perhaps have otherwise proved faithful to their employers, but who were outside the defences at the time, were altogether excluded. Very many more deserted, and several families were consequently left without the services of a single domestic. Several ladies have had to tend their children, and even to wash their own clothes, as well as to cook their scanty meals, entirely unaided. Combined with the absence of servants, the want of proper accommodation has probably been the cause of much of the disease with which we have been afflicted. I cannot refrain from bringing before the notice of his lordship in Council the patient endurance and the Christian resignation which have been evinced by the women in this garrison. They have animated us by their example. Many, alas! were made widows and their children fatherless in this cruel struggle. But all such seem resigned to the will of Providence, and many, among whom may be mentioned the honored names of Birch, of Polehampton, of Barber, and of Gall, have, after the example of Miss Nightingale, constituted themselves the tender and solicitous nurses of the wounded and dying soldiers in the hospital.

It only remains for me to bring to the favorable notice of his Lordship in Council the names of those officers who have most distinguished themselves, and afforded me the most valuable assistance in these operations. Many of the best and bravest of these now rest from their labours. Among them are Lieutenant-Colonel Case and Captain Radcliffe, whose services have already been narrated; Captain Francis, 13th Native Infantry, who was killed by a round shot, had particularly attracted the attention of Sir H. Lawrence for his conduct while in command of the Muchhee Bhowun; Capt. Fulton, of the Engineers, who also was struck by a round shot, had, up to the time of his early and lamented death, afforded me the most invaluable aid; he was, indeed, indefatigable; Major Anderson, the Chief Engineer, though from the commencement of the siege incapable of physical exertion from the effects of the disease under which he eventually sank, merited my warm acknowledgments for his able counsel; Captain Simons, Commandant of Artillery, distinguished himself at Chinhut, where he received the two wounds which resulted in his death; Lieutenants Shepherd and Arthur, 7th Light Cavalry, who were killed at their posts; Captain Hughes, 57th Native Infantry, who was mortally wounded at the capture of a house which formed one of the enemy's outposts; Captain McCabe, of the 32nd Foot, who was killed at the head of his men while leading his fourth sortie; as well as Capt. Mansfield, of the same corps, who died of cholera, were all officers, who had distinguished themselves highly. Mr. Lucas, too, a gentleman volunteer, and Mr. Boyson of the Uncovenanted Service, who fell when on the look out at one of the most perilous outposts, had earned for themselves reputations for coolness and gallantry.

The officers who commanded outposts—Lieutenant-Colonel Master, 7th Light Cavalry; Major Apthrop, 41st Native Infantry; Captain Sanders, 41st Native Infantry; Captain Boileau, 7th Light Cavalry; Captain Germon, 13th Native Infantry; Lieutenant Aitken and Lieutenant Longman, of the same corps; Captain Anderson, 25th Native Infantry; Lieutenant Graydon, 44th Native Infantry; Lieutenant Langmore, 71st Native Infantry; and Mr. Schilling, Principal of the Martiniere College—have all conducted ably the duties of their onerous position. No further proof of this is necessary than the fact which I have before mentioned, that throughout the whole duration of the siege the enemy were not able to take, but they could not even succeed in gaining, one inch of the posts commanded by these gallant gentlemen. Colonel Master commanded the critical and important post of the Brigade Mess, on either side of which was an open breach, only flanked by his handful of riflemen and musketeers. Lieutenant Aitken, with the whole of the 13th Native Infantry, which remained to us with the exception of their Sikhs, commanded by Bayley Guard—perhaps the most important position in the whole of the defences; and Lieutenant Langmore, with the remnant of his regiment (the 71st), held a very exposed position between the Hospital and the Watergate.—This gallant and deserving young soldier and his men were entirely without shelter from the weather both by night and day.

My thanks are also due to Lieutenants Anderson, Hutchison, and Innes, of the Engineers, as well as to Lieutenant Tulloch, 58th Native Infantry, and Lieutenant Hay, 48th Native Infantry, who were placed under them to aid in the arduous duties devolving upon that department. Lieutenant Thomas, Madras Artillery, who commanded that arm of the service for some weeks, and Lieutenants Macfarlane and Bonham, rendered me the most effectual assistance. I was, however, deprived of the services of the two latter, who were wounded, Lieutenant Bonham no less than three times, early in the siege. Captain Evans, 17th Native Infantry, who owing to the scarcity of artillery officers was put in charge of some guns, was ever to be found at his post.

Major Lowe, commanding her Majesty's 32nd Regiment, Captain Bassano, Lieutenants Lawrence, Edmonstoune, Foster, Harman, Cook, Clery, Browne, and Charlton, of that corps, have all nobly performed their duty. Every one of these officers, with the exception of Lieutenants Lawrence and Clery, have received one or more wounds, of more or less severity. Quartermaster Stribbling, of the same corps, also conducted himself to my satisfaction.

Captain O'Brien, her Majesty's 84th Foot; Captain Kemble, 41st Native Infantry; Capt. Edgell, 53d Native Infantry; Captain Dinning, Lieut. Sewell, and Lieut. Worsley, of the 71st Native Infantry; Lieut. Warner, 7th Light Cavalry; Ensign Ward, 48th Native Infantry, (who upon most of our artillery officers were killed or disabled, worked the mortars with excellent effect); Lieut. Graham, 11th Native Infantry; Lieut. Meehan, 4th Oude Locals; and Lieut. Keir, 41st Native Infantry—have all done good and willing service throughout the siege, and I trust that they will receive the favorable notice of his Lordship in Council.

I beg particularly to call the attention of the Government of India to the untiring industry, the extreme devotion, and the great skill which have been evinced by Surgeon Scott (Superintending Surgeon), and Assistant-Surgeon Boyd, of her Majesty's 32d Foot; Assistant-Surgeon Bird, of the Artillery; Surgeon Campbell, 7th Light Cavalry; Surgeon Boydon, 71st Native Infantry; Surgeon Ogilvie, Sanitary Commissioner; Assistant-Surgeon Favrer, Civil Surgeon; Assistant-Surgeon Partridge, 2d Oude Irregular Cavalry; Assistant-Surgeon Greenlow; Assistant-Surgeon Darby, and by Mr. Apothecary Thompson, in the discharge of their onerous and most important duties.

Messrs. Thornhill and Capper, of the Civil Service, have been both wounded, and the way in which they, as well as Mr. Martin, the Deputy-Commissioner of Lucknow, conducted themselves, entitles them to a place in this despatch. Capt. Carnegie, the Special Assistant-Commissioner, whose invaluable services previous to the commencement of the siege I have frequently heard warmly dilated upon both by Sir H. Lawrence and by Major Banks, and whose exertions will probably be more amply brought to notice by the civil authorities on some future occasion, has conducted the office of the Provost-Marshal to my satisfaction. The Rev. Mr. Harris and the Rev. Mr. Polehamtoh, assistant-chaplains, vied with each other in their untiring care and attention to the suffering men. The latter gentleman was wounded in the hospital, and subsequently unhappily died of Cholera. Mr. M'Crae, of the Civil Engineers, did excellent service at the guns, until he was severely wounded. Mr. Cameron, also, a gentleman who had come to Oude to inquire into the resources of the country, acquired the whole mystery of mortar practice, and was of the most signal service until incapacitated by sickness. Mr Marshall, of the Road Department, and other members of the Uncovenanted Service, whose names will on a subsequent occasion be laid before the Government of India, conducted themselves bravely and steadily. Indeed, the entire body of these gentlemen have borne themselves well, and have evinced great coolness under fire.

I have now only to bring to the notice of the Right Hon. the Governor General in Council the conduct of the several officers who composed my staff:—Lieut. James, Sub-Assistant-Commissary General, was severely wounded by a shot through the knee at Chinhut, notwithstanding which he refused to go upon the sick list, and carried on his most trying duties throughout the entire siege. It is not too much to say that the garrison owe their lives to the exertions and firmness of this officer. Before the struggle commenced he was ever in the saddle, getting in supplies, and his untiring vigilance in their distribution after our difficulties had begun, prevented a waste which otherwise long before the expiration of the 87 days might have annihilated the force by the slow process of starvation.

Captain Wilson, 13th Native Infantry, officiating Deputy-Assistant-Adjutant-General, was ever to be found where shot was flying thickest, and I am at a loss to decide whether his services were most valuable owing to the untiring physical endurance and bravery which he displayed, or to his ever-ready and pertinent counsel and advice in moments of difficulty and danger.

Lieutenant Hardinge, an officer whose achievements and antecedents are well known to the Government of India, has earned fresh laurels by his conduct throughout the siege. He was officiating as Deputy-Assistant-Quarternaster-General, and also commanded the Sikh portion of the cavalry of the garrison. In both capacities his services have been invaluable, especially in the latter, for it was owing alone to his tact, vigilance, and bravery, that the Sikh horsemen were induced to persevere in holding a very unprotected post under a heavy fire.

Lieutenant Barwell, 71st Native Infantry, the Fort Adjutant and officiating Major of Brigade, has proved himself to be an efficient officer.

Lieutenant Birch, of the 71st Native Infantry, has been my Aid-de-Camp throughout the siege. I firmly believe there never was a better Aide-de-Camp. He has been indefatigable, and ever ready to lead to a sortie or convey an order to a threatened outpost under the heaviest fire. On one of these occasions he received a slight wound on the head. I beg to bring the service of this most promising and intelligent young officer to the favourable consideration of his Lordship in Council.

I am also indebted to Mr. Couper, civil service, for the assistance he has on many occasions afforded me by his judicious advice. I have moreover, ever found him most ready and willing in the performance of the military duties assigned to him, however exposed the post or arduous the undertaking. He commenced his career in her Majesty's service, and consequently had had some previous experience of military matters. If the road to Cawnpore had been made clear by the advent of our troops, it was my intention to depute this officer to Calcutta, to detail in person the occurrences which have taken place, for the information of the Government of India. I still hope that when, our communications shall be once more unopposed he may be summoned to Calcutta for this purpose.

Lastly, I have the pleasure of bringing the splendid behaviour of the soldiers, viz., the men of her Majesty's 32nd Foot, the small detachment of her Majesty's 34th Foot, the Europeans and Native Artillery, the 13th, 48th, and 71st Regiments of Native Infantry, and the Sikhs of the respective corps, to the notice of the Government of India. The losses sustained by her Majesty's 84th, and by the European Artillery, show at least that they knew how to die in the cause of their country unto. Their conduct under the fire, the exposure, and the privations which they have had to undergo, has been throughout most admirable and praiseworthy.

As another instance of the desperate character of our defence, and the difficulties we have had to contend with, I may mention that the number of our countrymen was so reduced, that on the occasion of an attack the gunners, aided as they were by men of her Majesty's 32nd Foot, and by volunteers of all classes, had to run from one battery to another wherever the fire of the enemy was hotest, there not being nearly enough men to serve half the number of guns at the same time. In short, at last the number of European gunners was only 24, while we had, including mortars, no less than 30 guns in position.

With respect to the native troops, I am of opinion that their loyalty has never been surpassed. They were indifferently fed and worse housed. They were exposed, especially the 13th Regiment, under the gallant Lieut. Aitken, to a most galling fire of round shot and musketry, which materially decreased their numbers. They were so near the enemy that conversation could be carried on between them; and every effort, persuasion, promise, and threat, was alternately resorted to in vain to seduce them from their allegiance to the handful of Europeans, who, in all probability, would have been sacrificed by their desertion. All the troops behaved nobly, and the names of those men of the native force who have particularly distinguished themselves have been laid before Major General Sir James Outram, G. C. B., who has promised to promote them. Those of the European force will be transmitted in due course for the orders of his Royal Highness the General Commanding-in-Chief.

In conclusion, I beg leave to express, on the part of myself and the members of this garrison, our deep and grateful sense of the conduct of Major-General Sir J. Outram, G. C. B., of Brigadier-General Havelock, C. B., and of the troops under those officers, who so devotedly came to our relief at so heavy a sacrifice of life. We are also repaid for much suffering and privation by the sympathy which our brave deliverers say our perilous and unfortunate position has excited for us in the hearts of our countrymen throughout the length and breadth of her Majesty's dominions.

I have, &c.,
T. INGLIS, Colonel,
Her Majesty's 32nd, Brigadier.

Steam around the World in Sixty Days.

Our difficulties in the East have tended to bring under the notice of the British Government in a practical form the ideas of our enterprising townsman, Mr. John Clare, Jr., of Exchange Buildings, who favoured us a short time ago with the inspection of the model for the mammoth steamers he contemplates carrying the service out with. Mr. Clare bases his views of iron ship building on total efficiency, ostensibly to reduce the perils of the element and by constructing the vessels upon his patent metalic principles, he strongly avers that they will be proof to wind, water, and fire. Mr. Clare's views for the steam communication in question are now undergoing the consideration of the government. We have seen a tabular statement of the calculation that relate to what Mr. Clare has proposed, and which are admitted by the Admiralty department to be the ones upon which the Queen of England can alone hold her possessions in the East.

Mr. Clare's ideas are to bring any

The Revulsion of 1857.

ITS CAUSES AND RESULTS.

Referring to an interesting and elaborate article on "the late revulsion, its causes and results," in its issue of the 26th, the New York Herald remarks:

It unfolds the primary causes which led to the extraordinary revulsion of the past year. Remarkable for its suddenness, its wide-spread influence, as well as for the great number of failures which it caused, the large amount of liabilities it developed, together with the large aggregate losses sustained, or of capital, real and nominal, swept away. It was found by careful analysis that the great decline in produce and merchandise, and the losses sustained thereby to the trading public, both in America and Europe, have to some extent a ratio to the amount of assets which disappeared by the failures which occurred, together with the losses which houses sustained, who never failed nor suspended. The facts go to show that prices of all species of property, and especially of produce and merchandise, fell, by the inflation of the credit system, fostered by the loans of banks and corporations, reached a point which could not be sustained. They were above the value of labor to be given in exchange for them. Hence a reaction and breakdown sooner or later was inevitable. Debts incurred at the high prices of produce, merchandise, stocks and bonds had to be met with the proceeds of such property as sold at twenty-five to fifty per cent below the inflated value they had previously occupied in the trading world. The great decline in the staple articles of exports and imports are shown by carefully prepared estimates and tables. Had no other causes for the revulsion existed than the great losses sustained in the East India trade in wool, hides, flour, grain, and provisions, in sugar and cotton, and in the fall of corporation securities, they would have been amply sufficient to have produced it. The results of the revulsion have been made apparent, while the change, although inflicting much temporary suffering and inconvenience, will, no doubt, result in good by purifying the elements of trade and commerce from reckless speculation and reducing them to healthy and regular movements.

Death from Chloroform.

Yesterday evening an inquest was held by Coroner Scott, on the body of Mr. John McChesney, at his late residence, Wellington Place, who died in the operating room of M. D. French, Surgeon dentist, while under the influence of chloroform.—Deceased leaves a wife and two children to mourn his loss. The first witness called was

Dr. Tobias French, who being sworn, deposed:—(after some preliminary remarks which will be found in the testimony of Dr. M. D. French) Dr. Richardson, on being asked by Mr. McChesney if there was any danger to be apprehended from the taking of the chloroform, said there was danger, but he had administered it on several occasions and never saw any bad effects from it. Mr. McChesney asked Dr. Richardson if he would take the whole responsibility of the results. The Doctor said he would not, and immediately proceeded to cork up the bottle. Mr. McChesney said that he would have to take it some time and he might as well take it then as any other time. It was then administered in the usual way (Mr. French subsequently described, on being interrogated by the Foreman, the manner in which Dr. Richardson administered the chloroform, which was by placing it on a sponge and applying it to the nose of the patient.) After a very short time the patient began to laugh. I asked him what he was laughing at; and he said he could not help it to see those fellows laughing at him, imagining that we were laughing at him. It was then thought that he was sufficiently insensible to commence the operation of lancing the gums. He whinced under the lancing. I spoke to him to lean forward and spit into the bowl, which he did. He did not speak, however, but groaned several times, as people generally do, under the influence of chloroform. I made the remark then to the doctor that he was getting on remarkably well. After a few more inhalations, the doctor said it was better to draw the teeth, which my brother did, and extracted six. He seemed conscious of pain, and struggled in the drawing of the last tooth like a person not well under the influence. I then asked him to lean over the spit bowl, which I held before him and spit into it, which he did; I asked him to spit again when I saw a change come over his countenance—such a change as to startle me—and I said there was something wrong. Dr. Richardson opened the window and ordered me to tap the patient on the right side, so that he would not swallow any blood. Then I observed a great change and said he was gone; he looked cadaverous and his jaw fell. We then took him out and laid him on his side on the floor, with a pillow under his head, and made an application of ammonia, applied cold water to his head, and had the body briskly rubed. Dr. Richardson requested assistance. The servant asked who, when the doctor replied any one and every one. Drs. Russell, Nicol, Beaumont, and Haswell, were all brought in. A galvanic battery was also put in operation, but all was to no effect.

Dr. Mortimer D. French was sworn and said:—I was sent for by my brother to come into the operating room where a gentleman wished to have some teeth extracted; when I came in I asked Mr. McChesney if he would stand the operation; he said he was not strong enough to do so without chloroform; I then asked him what the condition of his health was; he said he had been suffering from dyspepsia for some time, and that he wanted his teeth in so that he might be able to masticate his food; he also said he was suffering from cold. I then enquired if he had any organic disease of the heart or lungs; he answered that he was not aware that he had. I told him though I had frequently extracted teeth from persons, while under the influence of chloroform, still I was not in the habit of administering the chloroform myself; and that it would be necessary to have his family physician or some other that was in the habit of giving chloroform under such circumstances. He replied that Dr. Grant was his physician; but he thought he was not in the habit of giving chloroform to patients, and asked me who generally did so in my office. I mentioned the names of Drs. Richardson and Beaumont, and some others; but said that Dr. Richardson had administered it in my office more than any other. Dr. Richardson was therefore sent for, and after some conversation with Mr. McChesney, proceeded to give the chloroform. Mr. McChesney then asked Dr. Richardson if he would take all the responsibility of giving it. The Dr. said he would not, and was about corking up the bottle. After some further conversation, the chloroform was administered by Dr. Richardson slowly and cautiously. It had the effect of causing him to laugh. I then proceeded to lance the gums. I could not say whether Mr. McChesney was totally insensible, but he made some slight resistance, after which chloroform was again renewed, and under circumstances described by my brother.—There were no signs that would cause apprehension of any bad effect resulting, during the operation. I have nothing further to add to the evidence given by my brother.

Thomas McChesney being sworn deposed:—I am brother of the deceased, I heard him speak about having some teeth extracted and taking chloroform; and I advised him not to do so, as there was risk attending it, more particularly as he had a bad cough recently. He did not seem to take much notice; but I understood from him that he would not go.

Dr. Richardson was examined and gave evidence confirmatory of that of Dr. French, showing that every precaution was taken in the case of Mr. McChesney, and quoted instances of a similar nature which had taken place in England.

Dr. Haswell sworn: when I went to Mr. French's I found the patient lying on the floor and respiration had ceased. Dr. Richardson was energetically using every means to restore animation. I assisted him in conjunction with Dr. Beaumont and Dr. Nicol for about an hour; but without avail. Everything was done that could be to restore the patient. I believe Dr. Richardson was perfectly competent to administer chloroform.

The jury considered that it was unnecessary to have any further medical testimony on the matter, and this accordingly finished the evidence.

The following verdict was rendered:—That deceased came to his death in Dr. French's operating room while under the influence of chloroform which he had voluntarily inhaled for the purpose of getting some teeth extracted, and that more than ordinary care was used in the administration of the chloroform.

The Persian Ambassador at Portsmouth.

His Excellency the Persian Ambassador, Feruk Khan, and suite, in all 13 persons, under the escort of Captain Lynch, the appointed envoy, arrived at Portsmouth on Saturday morning at 11 o'clock, from London, to make an inspection of the objects of interest at that arsenal. On their arrival, the distinguished party proceeded to the George Hotel, where they breakfasted.—On their arrival being known to the naval and military authorities, Major-General the Hon. Sir James Yorke Scarlett, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Garrison, Rear-Admiral W. F. Martin, Superintendent of the Dockyard, and their several staffs, personally visited his Excellency; and the governor posted a couple of sentinels at the porch of the George as a guard of honour. After their dejeuner his excellency and suite took carriages from their hotel and visited the dockyard, at the gate of which Flag-Lieutenant Brandreth was in waiting to conduct them to Admiral Martin, who, with the chief officers of the dockyard, was in readiness to show the illustrious Orientals over the establishment, which they most minutely inspected, especially the machinery department and the ship on building-slips, the skeleton of one (the Victoria, 121) which they walked through. On this perambulation smoking was allowed in the dockyard and under the very nose of the Admiral, who was a partiarps criminis, and we have not yet heard of any of the docks or basins having been set on fire by the perpetration of the crime. On leaving, His Excellency expressed, through the interpreter, his warmest acknowledgements for the courtesies shown by Admiral Martin and his officers, and the pleasure his inspection afforded him, and returned to the George, where they dined. Admiral Martin and General Scarlett and their respective staffs were invited to join the diplomatic banquet. After dinner the whole of the distinguished visitors honoured Mr. Rutley, lessee of the Portsmouth Theatre Royal with their presence, and sat out the whole of the performance, which comprised the highly instructive (!), moral (!), and lively play of Jane Shore, and the pantomime of Tom Tiddler, or Harlequin Kink of Card Castle, with which they expressed themselves greatly entertained. They slept at the George, and at a quarter past 1 the following afternoon Flag-Lieutenant Malcolm embarked them on the Commander-in-Chief's barge at the Victoria pier, and conducted them to the St. Vincent, 123, three decker, Capt. Eyres, C. B., and the Queen's state yacht Victoria and Albert, Captain the Hon. Jos. Denman, over which they were escorted by the respective commanding officers, and shown every feature of interest. The barge carried the Persian flag, and the Blenheim saluted with 19 guns en passant. His excellency and suite landed at the Gun-wharf, and walked through that store depot for munitions of war, where the carriages had been taken, and which returned with them, accompanied by Flag-Captain Seymour, C. B., to the George to luncheon, which they left at 5 o'clock, and took the 5 10 p. m. South-Western train to London.

McHenry alias Townsend.

From the Spectator, 29th ult.

We were yesterday permitted to inspect the draft of a memorial which has been forwarded to the Governor General by Messrs. Freeman and Start, concerning the case of R. J. McHenry, in which those gentlemen are afresh kindly interesting themselves. The memorial admirably sums up the history of this remarkable case, and thus concludes:—

"Your memorialists believe the statement as to the prisoner being in California at the time the murder was committed to be true—and they also have the greatest fears that unless the government take steps to procure the legal evidences to prove that fact, he will be convicted of a crime of which he is innocent. They further submit that, as the prisoner was forcibly brought from the jurisdiction of the laws of the United States and is without means or friends in this country, steps should be taken by the Government to procure the required evidence on his behalf.

Attached to the memorial was a letter whose existence has not heretofore been generally known. It was forwarded direct to Messrs. Freeman and Start from a Mr. Browning who keeps the Columbia House a hotel in San Francisco, California. It states that Mr. Browning received a letter from Canada, signed by R. J. McHenry the hand writing in which is that of a man named R. J. McHenry, who boarded with him in the spring of 1854, who then left for the mines, and returned in 1856, with a quantity of gold dust. Mr. Browning further states that Mr. McHenry went to the U. S. Mint with him to get the gold coined and that the signature in the books of the mint, which he has lately examined, is identical with that appended to the letter from Canada. This document has attached to it the signature and seal of the British Consul at San Francisco, But this, and Mr. Keefer's letters, and the documents from the Sons of Temperance in California, although they must have a moral effect on the minds of the community, yet are not legal evidence. Counsel might have them in their hands, and yet be prohibited from producing them before a jury. The sole evidence, then, which can be brought forward further than that previously adduced is that of Mr. Walters, who thinks he remembers seeing McHenry in California.—Hence the application to the Governor General, which we hope will be attended with the desired results, viz: the procuring of oral testimony.

We have lately heard from more than one quarter of the failing health of the prisoner in question, and one gentleman informed the writer that he was in doubt whether McHenry would survive until the next assizes. We yesterday received another letter from McHenry himself, which if true, reveals a state of matters sufficiently accounting for his bad health, and disgraceful in the extreme to all parties concerned.

On the 2nd of December, a colored boy in the upper apartment had been rapping several times for fire. McHenry and those with him had done the same, and in short every day complaints had been made about the cold.

"The Gaoler," proceeds McHenry, "asked the colored boy at about 1 p.m., if he was calling for fire. The boy said yes—he had to do something to keep himself warm. The Gaoler told him to 'shut up for a d—d nigger.' The boy gave him some reply whereupon the Gaoler struck him on the head with the foolock and keys locked him up in a cell till after dinner, then put a large ball and chain on his leg and ordered him to go down stairs into the yard. The boy refused: the Turnkey and Gaoler took hold of him, dragged him all the way down stairs, and finally, when the boy was exhausted, they got him into the yard and kept him standing in the cold some thirty minutes."

What follows this recital is still more strange. We continue to give McHenry's words, almost unaltered.

"The Sheriff came out and asked him how it commenced, if McHenry put him up to cry out for more fire or asked him to burn the gaol. The boy stoutly denied that I ever spoke to him about the fire. * * * * * * In searching he found what he was in reality looking for—a spring balance, which I procured to ascertain the precise allowance we got at a time when it began to look small. When weighed, the allowance invariably fell short. Meat, instead of 3 lbs., weighed from 5 to 8 oz. Bread weighed from 1 to 1½ lbs., although it should be 1½ lb all the time. He took away an old plate I had with some fat to make a miserable light, and a box I had for the purpose of putting my table on so that I could stand and read; also a pair of scissors. I wrote to the Sheriff, requesting him to come and see about this, but I have received no answer. * * * * * * Some seem to think I have a very comfortable situation here. At about 7 o'clock at night there is a chain and shackle fastened to my leg. I get something they call tea for breakfast; some bread and boiled meat for dinner, and something which tastes like water with a candle stirred around in it, but no vegetables. * * * * No candles are allowed on any conditions. From one-third to a half of the day we are compelled to stand over the stove pipe to keep warm, while now and then some Swamp Angels come in to have a gape, and leave without saying a word. * * * * There are six of us who all wash in one pail, holding about two-and-a-half gallons of pump water, so hard that to use soap with it is out of the question. Others as well as I, have complained about the coldness of the prison, as the stove is not attended to regularly; but when there is any probability of persons coming to the Court House or Gaol, the place is kept comfortable. We have remarked this so often that it has become a common saying, when the stove is hot, 'there is somebody about to come in." * * * * * * There are about 18 prisoners in the prison, each cutting the others' throats to crawl into the favor or graces of the gaoler."

In relation to the above, we say that, although we have no disposition to go into heroics about McHenry or his sufferings, we are shocked that a man can be imprisoned on mere suspicion, for so long a time as he. What has happened to him may happen to each of us; and it becomes an important question whether some law should not be framed for the purpose of bringing all those whose trial has been put off for want of sufficient evidence, to a speedy trial before some special Court. We may further remark that, if what is above stated about Merrittsville gaol be true, and it bears the similitude of truth, all the officials connected with that establishment should receive their congé. The Government Inspector of Gaols might advantageously report not only on the nature of the arrangements provided in each county, but also on the way the officials carry them out.

Slave Flogging.

The St. Louis News gives the following account of a case of slave-flogging in that city, which in barbarity has seldom a parallel:—A party of ladies were assembled in the lecture room of Tabernacle Church. Their attention was attracted by the sound of blows which, the ladies concluded, were caused by some one whipping a horse. The blows were very violent, and continued for two hours without intermission. The sound of the blows was found to proceed from the basement of Peters' house, next door to the church. The witnesses named went to the fence, and looked through the cracks, and there saw Mrs. Peters (a large and powerful woman,) with a raw-hide in her hand, lashing a naked girl, (slave girl) whose hands were tied behind her, and who was lying upon the ground. Mrs. Peter's foot was upon the girls neck, and she was laying on the lashes with all her force. She then grew tired, and called her husband's brother, John Peters, and by her direction, he whipped the girl in the same manner for nearly two hours. The witnesses stated that the stripes on her back could not be counted, they were so many, and that her back and shoulders were like a mass of raw flesh. The blood was streaming from her. She uttered no sound but a low moan, and they supposed from that circumstance that she was gagged. After the whipping ceased John Peters stooped down to untie the girls hands, and had great difficulty in doing so, because they were tied so tightly. The girl did not rise instantly, and appeared to be numbed. Mr. Peters then commenced hashing her again, to make her rise quicker."

☞For many years there has not been at this season of the year so great a fatality among the unacclimated as at present exists at Havana. It is stated by those resident there, that more than one-fourth of all those who have visited that port since October, have fallen victims to disease, which appears to be more virulent and unmanageable than for many years past.

An Arkansas Father's Advice to his Son.

Bob, you are about leaving home for strange parts. You're going to throw me out of the game and go it alone. The odds is again you Bob, but remember that industry and perseverance are the winning cards; they are the "blowers." Book larnin' and all that sort of thing will do to fill up with, like small trumps, but you must have the bowers to back 'em, else they ain't worth shucks. If luck runs again you pretty strong, don't cave in and look like a sick chicken on a rainy day, but hold your head up, and make believe you are flush of trumps. I've lived and travelled around some, Bob, and I've found out as soon as folks found a weak hand, they'd all buck again you strong. So when you're sorter weak, keep on a bold front, but play cautious. Be satisfied with a pint. Many's the hand I've seen euchered 'cause they played for too much. Keep your eyes well skinned, Bob; don't let 'em "rig" you. Recollect the game lays as much with the head as with the hands.

Be temperate; never get drunk, for then no matter how good your hand, you won't know how to play it; both bowers and the ace won't save you, for there's sartin to be a "mis-deal" or something wrong. And another thing, Bob (this was spoken in a low tone), don't go too much on the women; queens is kinder poor cards; the more you have of 'em, the worse for you; you might have three and nary a trump. I don't say discard 'em all; if you got hold of one that's a trump, it's all good, and there's sartin to be one out o'four. And above all Bob, be honest; never take a man's trick wot don't belong to you, nor "slip" cards, or "rig" for you can't look your man in the face, and when that's the case there's no fun in the game; its regular "cut throat." So, now, Bob, farewell; remember wot I tell you, and you'll be sure to win, and if you don't 'scarves you right if you get "skunked."

The Gwalior Rebels in India.

The unhappy death of General Havelock engrossed so much attention when the India news first came to hand, that the defeat of General Wyndham by the Gwalior rebels has attracted but little notice. It is, however, an event of no slight significance. It is the first actual defeat in the field which the English troops had suffered, and is the more important as the regiments were in part, if not wholly, trained to service in India, and thoroughly reliable men. One of them had fought under Havelock throughout the campaign. It is again an important event in view of its locality. Gwalior, the chief town in the dominions of Scindiah, is near enough to Oude to exercise a very marked influence over the turbulent and insubordinate people of that kingdom, and the place where the battle was fought seems to have been near a spot some fifty miles from Cawnpore, where Nena Sahib is supposed to be lurking with his force.

These Gwalior rebels, it need hardly be observed, differ in no particular from other Sepoys. They were paid by Scindiah, instead of the East India Company; that was the tribute he paid for the sort of independence he enjoyed. They were mostly raised in Oude, from whence the most troublesome of the Sepoys came, and were until the outbreak, highly considered as an efficient corps d'armee by the Company. They were, in fact an army by themselves, with artillery, cavalry, transport and commissariat complete.

Some of the English papers are inclined to reproach General Windham with the disaster. They say that he showed courage at the Redan, but nothing more; and that his suffering a defeat at the hands of these Gwalior rebels, when he must have had at least half as many men as they, shows a want of military skill on his part. Be this as it may, it seems that Sir Colin Campbell has pretty nearly effaced the stain and the Gwaliors, too; we may, perhaps hear no more of them.

The accident may teach the English and their Indian leaders that though the backbone of the rebellion may have been broken its body is not crushed yet. It looks very much as though the English were going to have a second edition of our Florida war upon a larger scale; as though Nena Sahib and the other rebel chiefs would take to the mountains and to the jungle and carry on a guerilla warfare, as best they could, for many a year to come. It is known that the Indians can live on a handful of rice, so that commissariat is a thing not requiring preparation, and the hills and jungles of Hindostan offer magnificent hiding places for banditti. The end—the ultimate end—is quite certain; but meanwhile many a brave Englishman will be likely to find a grave under the sod of Hindostan.—New York Herald.

Mormon Robbers.

The following is rather a tough story, notwithstanding the writer's veracity is avouched by so respectable an authority:

-From the Belleville, N. J., Democrat, Jan. 16.

Mr. J. R. Nolen, of this city furnished us with a perusal of a letter, extracts from which we make as appears below. The letter was written to a member of his family by a young man who formerly resided in Belleville, and started last Summer to cross the plains for California, and may be relied on as true, the writer being well known in this city as a young man of veracity:

"Utah Territory, Nov. 30, 1857.

There were ten of us that started to go to California with mule teams. We had two wagons, six mules and five men to each wagon. After we left Leavenworth City for the wilde, open plains, day after day passed off pleasantly, and we had no difficulty with the Indians or any body else till we got to the Sweet Brier River. Three miles from the Devil's Gap we were attacked by the Mormons. They took our two wagons and burnt them before our eyes, took us all ten, searched and took from us everything we had, money, &c., and tore the clothes from off our backs, and then tied us to a tree, and kept us tied three days and nights without a bite to eat. You do not know how I suffered. The third day they gave us a pound of bread, and told us that five days from that time we should be put to death; and the d—d brutes gave us choice, either to be burned to death or to be chopped into pieces by degrees. Here we were, tied up to a tree and trembling with fear. Not that we feared death, but only the way they had chosen for us to die. But the night after we got our bread, it was about 12 o'clock at night, as God would have it, the fellow who stood guard over us went to sleep, and two of our boys got loose from the tree where we were tied, and slipped round to us, and untied us all, and O, God, our merciful parent, we thanked and prayed to him for our relief. After our escape from our enemies, in two days travel we overtook Col. Johnston's command, on his way to Great Salt Lake City. We were stark naked when we entered the camp of Colonel Johnston, and hungry. The first man we were taken to was Colonel Johnston, and to him we told all our sufferings, and he gave us clothes and plenty to eat. Col. Johnston sent out two companies of dragoons after the Mormons who had us prisoners, and the dragoons killed twenty of the Mormons and took thirty of them prisoners. Oh, how we looked at the prisoners that were brought into camp! They could not look us in the face, or any other way, but on the ground. We then swore here, in the name of God, to have revenge—and we shall have it! We all volunteered into Colonel Johnston's command to have revenge and see the American flag wave over the Mormons. We have been in the service since the 17th of October; we volunteered for ten months. We have made several marches since we entered the service, and are now in Winter quarters at a Mormon fort called Fort Bridger. Our company (third dragoons) was at the head of the batteries when we fought and drove the Mormons from this old fort. We killed about eighty Mormons and took ten prisoners. There were twelve of our men killed and five wounded. We took Fort Bridger, and shall remain here till Spring; and in the Spring it shall be Salt Lake City or death! When you are sitting in a warm room, by a good fire, think of me, sitting in a cold tent, sometimes almost frozen.

The Postmaster-General's Election.

The election which has been rendered necessary in West Northumberland, by the elevation of the Honourable Sidney Smith to a seat in the Cabinet, with the portfolio of the Postmaster General, has some features which will make it memorable in the annals of Canadian history. But two months ago, Mr. Smith was re-elected for that constituency, on the ground that he was a strong opponent of Mr. John A. McDonald's government. Immediately upon his securing his seat, negociations are entered into with Mr. McDonald, whereby Mr. Smith reverses his position, and becomes not only reconciled to Mr. McDonald's government, but actually a principal party in it. Those who have followed Mr. Smith in his course through parliament will not be shocked by the apparent tergiversation he has just exhibited. Mr. Smith's opposition was always qualified. He was in opposition just as far as would still allow of his hanging on to the skirts of the government. His motto was self-interest; the government could always have his support when they would acquiesce in his claims, which he was always ready to put forward and most so when they were least able to deny him. And Mr. Smith was always ready to feign opposition in order to coerce the government. We are among those who, though an opponent of Mr. McDonald's government, still looked upon the late elections as having upon the whole, brought him a good deal of strength, but now that he has descended so low as to pick up a mere village politician, who never distinguished himself beyond a vulgar appeal to an ignorant jury, in behalf of a roguish client, and one too who he must have felt to be a dangerous friend, as he is a dishonest opponent, we are quite satisfied that Mr. McDonald is on his last legs. Then, what a disgrace it will be to the government, that it has possessed itself of the service of Mr. Smith, at the expense of every thing that is honourable and dignified; the arrangement entered into by the high contracting parties being that Mr. Smith's constituency shall receive a bonus of £50,000, in the shape of aid to the Cobourg and Peterborough railroad, if they return the new Postmaster General. Of the constituency itself what will be thought, if they coalese with Mr. Smith in the acceptance of such a bribe, in exchange for their late professions of disaffection towards the government. And yet there is every reason to expect that the movement will be successful, since at a late meeting in Cobourg, to consider the question, the leaders among the opposition gave way to the softening argument of decreased taxation, as against political independence. The whole transaction is as shameful to the Opposition as it is disgraceful to the Government. The only party who suffers nothing, is the Postmaster General himself; he is proof against all virtuous feeling.

The Peterboro' Histrionic Club.

By advertisement it will be seen that Peterboro' possesses a Histrionic Club, a circumstance not until now publicly known. Of its component parts we are not apprised, and will have to await the development of its personal character, to take place on Friday evening in the Town Hall. As this will be its first appearance, it is no more than generous to allow it to enter on the stage without prejudice, but as the advertisement conveys the idea that the present performance is only the first of a series, it may be well to pass under notice some reflections applicable to the subject. We do not believe, and till proof shall be given for a contrary opinion, shall continue to doubt that this neighborhood contains such talent as would allow its possessor to appear naturally in any other character than what his vulgar lot has appointed him to fill; there are it is true not a few who appear not to appreciate their condition, and in the neglect of the manners and duties appertaining to it, make themselves the apert of the sober-minded, in a vain attempt to imitate what they were not fitted to be. If the Theatre is to be occupied by such men as these, there will be no novelty in the performance, to common observers; the public street is a theatre, in which the observed and the observer are alike actors. There is this difference, however, between the public throughfare and the play house, that the street performer is spared the excitement of popular applause, which is the greatest danger the young stage-player is exposed to. Many an enthusiast would have been saved from becoming a gambler, had his first play been unsuccessful; and many a fancied delineator of character would have been content to perfect his own, had he not mistaken the approval of his imagination for the applause of the audience.

The Port Hope Road.

Mr. Fowler complains very bitterly of the treatment he has received from certain parties in Port Hope who have obtained control of a quantity of debentures avowedly for the purpose of defraying the obligations of the Railway Company towards the contractors on the road, but in reality they had no such intention, as the engagements are not met. It will be too bad if, because the Smiths have manœuvred things so as to be able to harrass the contractors, the line should remain closed longer than it otherwise would be, but such a course seems highly probable, and in view of the great injustice it would be to Peterboro, and the injury to Port Hope trade, something should be done to produce a more healthful tone in the railway affairs. Mr. Fowler publishes a resolution of the Town Council of Port Hope which explains what should have been done with the money, after it was handed to the Railway Company, and he says that although it has been paid over to them, he has not been properly accounted with, but is far in arrears, and this is further shewn by Mr. Ferguson's letter. Then there are two accounts which have been furnished to Mr. Fowler, of which he most justly complains since he represents that the contract has not been entered into between the Company and G. W. Tate & Co., but that they are accounting to the Company for the earnings of the road, they in fact working out their contract of repairs on the road and running it for the Company; a large portion of the items Mr. Fowler says, were charged at a time when the Company and himself were united in the object of striving to accomplish the means of carrying out the extension scheme as is shown by the dates. Poor Fowler! He has been set down among strange company.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—I am requested by Mr. Fowler to make a short explanation of some remarks that have been made by the Review of this morning on a letter inserted therein by Mr. Fowler.

It would appear a good deal of excitement exists in the Town since the appearance of these remarks, and that all kinds of rumors have been going around; among others that the Contractors have received all the money for building the road, and that now, when nearly completed, they decline to immediately open it. Another story is that difficulties and differences have arisen between Port Hope and the Contractors.

For the information of the Rate-payers of Peterboro' it is now stated what has been received from the Municipalities of Peterboro' and Port Hope respectively up to the present time viz:

" by 5 Debentures at 10 per cent discount	4937	10 0
January 24, 1856, by 3 debentures at 15 per cent discount	1551	5 0
Total payment of Peterboro	£6978	15 0
October 13, 1857, by cash	£1000	0 0
" by 2 Debentures at par	1000	0 0
January 26, 1857, by check on Bank of Upper Canada	2305	0 0
" by 2 Debentures at 10 per cent discount	904	5 0
Total payment of Port Hope	£5209	5 0

These sums together make £12,186 out of £40,000, which the Towns of Port Hope and Peterboro are bound to provide for the construction of the Branch. It is right to mention however that Peterboro has paid towards the iron for the road about £12,000, which Mr. Fowler has of course to give credit for when finally arranged, but which will then leave a balance in his favor from Port Hope and Peterboro of about £15,000. And I may here remark that in my official capacity I have paid out for Mr. Fowler several thousands of pounds on the Branch beyond what has yet been received from the Municipalities, and that quite independent of liabilities for which Mr. Fowler's name is pledged for further outlay.

I remain, &c.,
Your ob't servant,
P. FERGUSON,
Paymaster.

Peterboro', Feb. 5, 1857.

Copy of Resolution passed in the Town Council of the Town of Port Hope, Aug. 24, 1857:

Moved by Mr. McLeod seconded by Mr. Ward:

That this Council do hereby ratify the conditional agreement made between the Port Hope, Lindsay & Beaverton Railway Company, and Messrs. Tate & Fowler, for a lease of the Railway from Port Hope to Lindsay, and for a lease of the charter to right to build the Railway from Millbrook to Peterboro, and do hereby agree that in the event of the said agreement being carried out they will invest the sum of ten thousand pounds in and towards the construction of the said Millbrook Branch upon being guaranteed six per cent per annum therefor by the road, and furthermore this Council do give their consent that the Commissioners of the Port Hope Harbour shall cause an issue of debentures of that Corporation to be made to the extent of seventy-five thousand pounds currency payable in twenty years, bearing interest at 8 per cent per annum and secured by mortgage of the harbour works property and tolls, as provided by the statute in that behalf upon the said Board of Commissioners paying over or delivering to this Council or to the Mayor debentures of the said proposed issue to the amount of forty five thousand pounds, being the amount loaned by this Council to the said Board, this Council will surrender to the said Board the security or debenture now held by this Council for the said loan, thus upon receipt of said debentures this Council will advance the same or so much thereof as from time to time may be found necessary to the said Railway Company to enable the said Company to pay off and close the accounts with their present contractors, and to complete and carry into full operation and effect their said agreement with the said Messrs. Tate & Fowler.—Carried.

☞We learn from the Peterborough Review that the Finance Committee of the County Council in their Report "—in allusion to the letter of the Treasurer (Walter Sheridan, Esq.,) calling attention to the attacks upon him in the Examiner, while deeming it scarcely worth while to notice it at all, yet stated their belief that the insinuations referred to were perfectly groundless." For the information of the public we have to state that the Examiner was not called upon to substantiate the charges had he been, the Committee would not have been able to make so smooth a report upon the use Walter has made of the Treasurer's account. But this is the way the public business is conducted. Walter shows what he wants to expose and conceals what is not fit to be seen; and the Committee report in the dark; perhaps they could not see, if they had light. Walter, you are a cunning fellow, and should have been a Bishop.

☞The Peterborough Review is advised that he has credited the criticism upon his "crying evil" to the wrong cloth. The clergy had no hand in it. Behave yourself, Thomas, if you want to be overlooked.

Arrival of the "Edinburgh."

New York, Feb. 4.

The screw steamship "Edinburgh," Cummings Commander, from Glasgow on the 17th ult., arrived at this port last evening.

She brings Glasgow papers of 16th of January, containing a few hours later intelligence from London and Paris than that received by the "Canada."

The London "Times" of the 16th, in its 2nd edition, publishes a letter dated Dec. 2nd, from Cawnpore, describing the retreat after Windham's defeat and the panic in the camp.

Windham lost his camp, with 500 tents, and the mess plate of six regiments.

It is said he left his flank exposed, and made no provisions for the safety of his camp.

The conduct of the 64th Regiment was admirable. They made a desperate charge. Major Sterling, Capts. Murphy, and Macrae were shot dead. Capt. Parsons was wounded. Brigadier Wilson was shot after exclaiming, "Now boys, you have them." Two British guns opened on the regiment by mistake, whilst the enemy's cavalry charged them.

The Queen has signified her intention to bestow the Victoria Cross upon Captain Havelock, son of the deceased hero.

There is no particular change to be noted in financial and commercial affairs by this arrival.

end up, lest worse disease should be engendered, for the garrison were suffering severely from disease as well as from the searching fire of the enemy. Everybody was at work; delicate ladies attended to the wants of the wounded men; civilians handled the muttock and shovel, not without playing an effective part in the more direct operations of the defence. For 87 days the fierce overwhelming foe, notwithstanding the great disparity of numbers and the advantages of his position, could not succeed in winning an inch of ground from Englishmen who knew that they had no mercy to expect at the hand of the enemy. If the position had been forced they would have been butchered to a man, and every Englishwoman in Lucknow foully dishonoured and then butchered too. The garrison knew this well. All honour should be given to those faithful native soldiers—among the faithless faithful only found—of the 13th, 48th and 71st Regiments of the Line who formed part of the defenders of Lucknow. Their loyalty has indeed been tried in the fire and we rejoice to see that, as a mark of honour, the survivors are to be incorporated into a single regiment, to be called "the Regiment of Lucknow." No reward is too great for such men as these, as no punishment is too severe for the vile traitors who have betrayed their trust amid circumstances of cruelty so revolting that one can but think of them as wild beasts to be exterminated from the face of the earth. In 87 days, then, after the first investment, and after a sickening period of hope deferred, Havelock and Outram forced their way into the Residency. Then came the second investment, of which it will be sufficient to say, that as the first so was the second period of trial. One terrible proof of its severity we have in the death of a good soldier "Havelock," an event which will be felt as a domestic calamity by every household in the empire. Henry Havelock was no fine gentleman soldier, but a man who loved his profession, and knew his duties well. From Havelock's career we may learn what feats a real soldier can perform and how an empire may be saved by the skill and energy of a single man. All honour, again we say, to the glorious memory of such a leader as this! England can well distinguish in the long run between the officers who are fitted to conduct her armies to victory and the more abundant crowd of military pretenders who appear on the stage but as the harbingers of shame and defeat. How deeply every Englishman must regret that this gallant soldier passed to his rest without hearing how his services had been appreciated by his countrymen!

The Mildness of the Season.

ITS PROBABLE CAUSE.

From the Montreal Advertiser.

In the summer of last year a French savant announced a change in the ocean currents, and predicted therefrom a corresponding increase in the temperature of the adjoining regions.

Whether this is a fact or only a lucky guess, such as that which conferred fame and wealth upon "Murphy" the almanac maker some years ago, we do not know; but we find in the American journals a corresponding statement to the effect that the Gulf stream, that immense body of heated water which pours across the Atlantic, exercising powerful effects on climate, and preserving in the surrounding ocean a marked individuality, has approached the coast of America, a full degree north of its usual course.

It is possible that such an event would materially affect the climate of this continent, and the fulfilment of the prediction of the French savant gives the theory weight.

The readers of M'Clure's discoveries in the Arctic regions will remember that he found near Melville Sound, in a region where the dwarf willow is now the largest product of vegetation, the remains of extensive forests of timber now confined to localities many hundred miles south. These remains are partially fossilised, and partially rotten. These trees must have been growing within a few centuries, proving that the northern portions of America must then have enjoyed a much more moderate climate than now prevails, a fact which is also placed past doubt by the well authenticated records of the most northern Scandinavian settlements.

It is quite possible that this great change originated by the diversion of the tropical currents from the continent, and consequently that their return will free the Arctic regions from their icy fetters, and restore to North America the temperature which it enjoyed when the elephant was among the denizens of its forests.

It is clear that the extraordinary amelioration of our climate so suddenly affected is not merely local, for the same result has affected Europe, and we must seek the same cause as its operator.

A strong argument in favor of the Gulf stream is the fact that this amelioration decreases as we proceed West, far into the interior of the country, where its effects would naturally be lessened, and where the temperature is more open to the influence of air currents sweeping down from the ice plateaus of the Arctic circle. As far as we can learn, the winter is severe in the north-west, and has been actually colder upon the plains of Utah, in northern Iowa and Minnesota than in Canada.

This subject is one of great practical interest, and we commend it to those who are better able to inquire into and discuss it, than we are.

Case of Suspected Poisoning.

A case of suspected poisoning at St. Jerome, has lately come to light, and has caused no little excitement in that usually quiet locality. The circumstances of the case, as we gather them from Le Pays, and from other sources, are as follow. There is a man named Antonine Desforges living at St. Jerome, who is a shoemaker by trade. He is forty-two years old.—His wife was over sixty years of age.—For some time back she was not very well, and her husband was often heard to say he wished her in her grave so that he might marry a younger woman. On the evening of the 16th instant, Desforges left his home to go, as he stated, to St. Canut, where he said he had some business with the son of Mary Ann Crepin, widow of Jean Bte. Gélinier, generally known by the name of the Widow Belisle. He arrived there about half-past six o'clock, and put up at an inn kept by Francois Baron. This is some seven miles from St. Jerome. On entering the house Desforges said he was coming from Mousy Branche, where he had been to see an individual, who, not being at home, he had returned and met his man on the road, who had invited him to go and sleep with him, which he refused.—After he had related his story in an agitated mood, he (Desforges) pretended that his horse was much heated, and that, in consequence, he would have to remain at the inn all night. Baron went out immediately to take care of the horse, but he found that it was not at all heated. Desforges remained at St. Canut. During the evening he spoke of his wife—said she was sick, and would surely die. At about nine o'clock he laid down on some Buffalo robes but passed a troublesome night, without sleep. According to the people of the house, he rose and laid down again seven or eight times during the night. Next morning, when Desforges returned home, he found his wife a corpse. On the evening previous to her death, Mrs. Desforges was worse than usual. On the morning of that day she had a visit from the widow Belisle, who said she came to attend her, and to remain the night with her. Mrs. Desforges consented, and at nine o'clock, after drinking a cup of ginger prepared by the widow, Mrs. Desforges and her went to bed. In the morning Mrs. Desforges was dead. It is said that widow Belisle was frequently heard to say, that she wished the wife of Mr. Desforges out of the way so that she could marry him. At the inquest, which was held a few days ago, the son and son-in-law of Madame Belisle, gave some hard testimony against her.—The son stated that on hearing of Mrs. Desforges's death, he exclaimed, before several persons, "Last night when I heard that mother had gone to sleep at Mrs. Desforges, to-morrow perhaps Mrs. Desforges may be dead." This same person also said he suspected his mother of poisoning, some time ago, his father and his sister. The Widow Gobier, or Belisle, as she is generally called, is about forty-three years old. Her looks are not remarkable, save that she has great harshness of features, and her eyes are brisk, and flash when animated by passion. Her reputation is none of the best, and, as has been seen above, she is even despised by her own children.—An inquest was held, at which it was stated that Desforges arrived at the house at half-past nine; laid down on a sofa in the room with the two women. At ten o'clock Mrs. Desforges began to groan, when the widow asked her where she suffered? to which she received as a reply—"Do not speak to me: when I cough it hurts me." She then yawned and died. J. B. Desforges, on his side, states, that having fallen asleep, he was hastily awakened by a dreadful cry, when he saw Widow Belisle standing in the room, trying to light a candle.—She told him to rise and call for help, as his sister-in-law was very low. He obeyed but she was dead. The Widow Belisle has been committed to jail on a charge of poisoning Mrs. Desforges, and Antoine Desforges and J. B. Desforges have been committed as accomplices. We understand that the stomach of the deceased woman is in the hands of Dr. Robert Crank, House Surgeon of the Montreal General Hospital, for the purpose of having its contents analyzed.—Pilot, 30th January.

The Royal Families of Great Britain and Prussia.

Your readers are well aware, both from their own historical studies and from former letters of mine, that the approaching matrimonial alliance of the two royal families of Great Britain and Prussia is far from being without precedent in the joint history of the two countries. Frederick I., the first King of Prussia, married Sophia Charlotte, the sister of George I. of Great Britain; Frederick William I., the second King of Prussia, married Sophia Dorothea, the sister of George II., and thus the Electress Sophia of Hanover, to whose lineal descendants, being of the Protestant faith, the present dynasty of Great Britain is confined, is the common ancestress of the two houses. That Frederick the Great, of whom the nation now gladly calls to mind that he was the offspring of a Prussian prince and an English princess, did not marry the Princess Amelia, the daughter of George II., nor his sister marry the Prince of Wales, was the result of Austrian intrigue at this court, taking advantage of the offence that George II. had unintentionally given to the King and in spite of the unremitting endeavors of the Queen to bring it about. This was the first deviation from the English alliance that had occurred from the time when the great elector of Brandenburg, Frederick William, first espoused the cause of William of Orange and Protestantism, and lent him his Brandenburgers and his Marshal Shomberg to fight their battles in Ireland and elsewhere. To this non-fulfilment of the heart's longings on the part of Frederick the Great and his mother are to be traced the un-Prussian and un-Protestant policy of Frederick, and his cheerless, childless home; and however great a man and commander Frederick the Great was, he hereby laid the foundation of Prussia's present weakness.

In the reign of Frederick the Great's brother and successor, Frederick William II., the father of the late king, the natural and auspicious union of these two great families were renewed in the person of the late Duke of York, who in 1791 married the Princess Frederica of Prussia. The result of this return to the natural alliance, matrimonial and political, of the two countries was the co-operation soon after of the Prussians with the British in the campaign against the French in Holland. The outbreak of the French revolution and the disasters that befell the arms of Prussia at the hands of Napoleon and his victorious generals soon after brought about not only Prussia's deep degradation, political and moral, but compelled an infidelity on her part to the English alliance, the most flagrant act of which was the occupation of Hanover in 1806. This stain was again wiped out by the spirited conduct of the nation in the war of liberation, and the staunch heroism of the Prussian forces under Bluchet, whose co-operation with our own army gave the battle of Waterloo the decisive character of a turning point to European history for about half a century. So long, however, as the crown of Hanover rested conjointly with that of Great Britain and Ireland on one and the same head, the cordial feeling and the close alliance that had formerly existed between the two royal families could hardly be restored; since the assension of our present Queen, however, this last obstacle has vanished, and the present Princess of Prussia, who, in many other respects, resembles Queen Sophia Dorothea, consort of Frederick William I., is at length about to see her heart's warmest longing realized in the marriage of her son with an English princess. As was the case with Frederick the Great, Prince Frederick William has always nurtured, from his earliest youth, the firm determination to marry an English wife, even before he knew or was aware of the existence of the Princess Royal.—Times Berlin Correspondent.

The Waterloo Bridge Mystery.

A London paper states that a sensation was created by a report that a soldier in the camp at Colchester had confessed to having been concerned in murdering the man whose mangled remains were recently found on one of the piers of Waterloo bridge. It appears that a deserter from the 66th Regiment, named Thomas Pedlar was brought back to the camp, and whilst in the guard room, attempted to commit suicide by strangling himself with his neckerchief. He afterwards dropped some hints about having committed some crime which he cared more about than desertion; and at last said that he with two others, murdered a man in London, and after he had been cut up and put into a carpet-bag a woman took it away and threw it over Waterloo bridge. In reply to the sergeant who had charge of him, he said the man was not a foreigner but a farmer, and had £60 about him. The circumstance was communicated to the borough police, and Superintendent Dunn had an interview with the prisoner, when he said it was all humbug.—The prisoner was brought up at the Borough beach, when he made a similar retraction. The Mayor (who is a physician) expressed his belief that the man's mind was deranged. He also appeared to wish to exchange military for civil custody as he said he should rather go to jail than be sent back to the camp. No reliance whatever was placed on his statement as to the murderer, and he was handed back to the military authorities.

A WIFE POISONED BY HER HUSBAND'S NEGRO MISTRESS.—Great excitement exists in Henry County, Ky., in consequence of the poisoning of Mrs Porter by a slave woman, who had long been on terms of intimacy with her husband.—The Shelby News gives the following account of the affair:—

"On Thursday, 24th of December, the wife of Mr Hous Porter died three or four days after her accouchement, under circumstances which induced a strong suspicion that she was poisoned. An examination of the stomach was made and strychnine found. A negro girl, about 20 years of age, belonging to Colonel Ed. Smith, was arrested on suspicion and tried on Tuesday the 26th, when facts going to show that Mrs. P was poisoned by the woman were proven.—Having been apprised of the certainty of her conviction and punishment, she made a full confession, deeply implicating Porter, the husband of the deceased. She says that Porter has been trying to get her to kill Mrs. P. for several months, that attending to kill, her if she did not,—That he told her that he would bear with it no longer if she didn't kill his wife: that that was the last time he would ask her: if she refused he would cut her throat, or words to that effect.—He gave her strychnine, and told her to use it. She did not want to use it, but nothing against Mrs. P. and believed she was a good woman, but she feared P. would kill her, and done it to save her life. It was shown that Porter bought strychnine last August—that he is dissolute and unrestrained in his morals: and many other corroborating circumstances being brought to light throwing suspicion on him, he was arrested and placed in confinement until Monday next, when he will pass an examining trial. Public opinion is very decided in the belief of Porter's guilt.

A FIENDISH OUTRAGE.—We learn that an outrage of a most fiendish character almost too horrible and revolting to be chronicled, occurred in Florence, Ky., about twenty miles from Covington, on Thursday last. In the afternoon of that day, a little girl about six years of age, the daughter of Joseph Bryant, Esq., of Florence, was missing from the house, and notwithstanding diligent search was made could nowhere be found. The neighborhood was aroused, and the wells and streams examined, but the search was fruitless, until a negro boy, the property of Miles Marcus, Esq., suggested that she might have fallen into a well that was not used, at some distance from the house. Thither the party proceeded, and were horrified to find the brains and blood of the little girl scattered about the top of the well! Search was immediately made in the water, when the body was brought to surface, and a most painful spectacle presented. The child had been violated, her head crushed in a most inhuman manner, and the skull nearly emptied of the brains, which were found scattered about the well! Those who were present say that the sight presented was of the most horrible description. From circumstances which transpired during the search, suspicion fastened upon the negro boy, who suggested making an examination of the well where the body was found, and on accusing him of the crime, he reluctantly confessed that he had first violated the person of the little girl, beat her brains out, and then threw the body into the well to cover up the crime. When the fact became known in the neighborhood the people assembled in large numbers, and proposed to hang the negro on the spot and the excitement was so great that it was difficulty he could be kept out of the hands of the infuriated crowd, who were determined to wreak summary vengeance upon the murderer. Cooler counsels prevailed, however, and the more moderate of the populace finally succeeded in getting possession of the negro, and handing him over to the civil authorities. He was then conveyed to the jail by a strong guard, and securely confined and ironed.—Cin. Daily Gaz.

The Paris correspondent of the London Herald telegraphs on the 16:—As an imperial carriage drove up to the main entrance of the theatre, and as one of the footmen was in the act of opening the door, three percussion shells, filled with fulminating powder, were flung from the top of one of the houses opposite among the cortege, and exploded on reaching the ground.—The first shell fell in front of the carriage, its fragments killing one horse, wounding the footman, and piercing the hat of the Emperor about an inch above the head.—The other shells burst among the crowd and escort. An eye-witness says there was an interval of a few seconds between the second and third explosions. The Emperor had alighted; he then carried the Empress to the steps of the Opera-house, but scarcely had he done so when a third shell burst under the carriage, and shattered it to pieces. The houses opposite were immediately taken possession of by the police, and in one several Italians were arrested, one having a loaded revolver. The shells must have been large, containing a great quantity of gunpowder, as the report broke all the windows on the opposite side of the street. It is supposed the attempt was believed certain of success, for the death of the Emperor was a current report at the time of the outrage. At the opening of the Bourse, the cry of "Vive l' Empereur!" was universal. Two hundred persons have been taken, and arrests continue; even some of the police have been arrested. The indignation against the assassin is increased because they must have known that the Empress and other ladies were present.—The explosions were heard at a quarter of a mile, and placed the immediate spot in darkness for a short time. The Emperor's hat was torn in two parts. The collar of the cloak he wore, and that part which covered his shoulder, was rent open."

The Herald's correspondent says:—"It is reported to me, on good authority, that Mr. Buchanan contemplates withdrawing the troops from Utah. Mr. Bernbeinsel, the Mormon delegate, has submitted propositions to the administration, indicating the willingness of the Mormons to vacate Utah, and colonise on some of the islands of the sea, outside of the jurisdiction of the United States, provided the government will purchase, at a fair valuation, the Salt City improvements. Mr. Bernbeinsel asks that commissioners be sent out to arrange terms and details. The administration confidently expect that Kansas will be admitted as a state, with the Lecompton constitution and there will be less opposition from northern and western democratic members than generally supposed."

THE BRIDEGROOM AN HOUR.—On Thursday, proceedings in the curious matrimonial imbroglio of Mr. George Taylor and Miss Hawley, his alleged wife, came up before Judge Sutherland in New York, and the writ of habeas corpus bringing Miss Hawley before the Court was discharged. The young lady, who is spoken of as rather attractive in person, totally repudiated her husband, and refused to speak to or receive any communications from him. She deposed that she was under no restraint, and that her repugnance to her lord and master was insurmountable. She acknowledges that she freely married Mr. Taylor, but very shortly afterwards was taken with the present complaint—a feeling of total dislike towards the gentleman. She is an heiress, while Taylor is a poor clerk, but was shortly since, the favourite candidate with her mother for the hand of Miss Hawley. A very affectionate letter from the mother-in-law was produced in Court. The whole case is quite singular. Here is a lady who confesses to an engagement of a month, taking extraordinary pains to get married secretly, and the moment the act is consummated repudiating the entire transaction in refusing to see her husband. Still there must be some hidden cause for this determination of the lady, which is intimated in her dislike, and positive refusal to reveal to the Court the reason for her determination not to know Taylor, and her return to her friends.—Buffalo Express.

THE PIGEONS AND THE WEATHER.—A farmer in one of the neighbouring towns tells the Buffalo Courier that if the birds are to be regarded as any judge of the weather, and what is to be, we shall have an open winter all the way through. The pigeons have not migrated to the south, but seem to be more numerous, thereabouts than they have been at any time during the past year. They hover about the barns and barn yards in large flocks, living on most amiable terms with the sheep and cattle, evincing no anxiety about the weather and no disposition to clear out.

Feeding of Cattle.

A curious and very important investigation has just been made by a late surgeon to the military hospitals in the Crimea and at Scutari—Frederick J. Grant, Esq.—respecting the wholesomeness of the flesh of fat prize cattle as an article of food. Mr. Grant says, speaking of the late Smithfield cattle show:—

"Throughout the exhibition one circumstance particularly arrested my attention. It was the size of the animals compared with their respective ages. The bullocks averaged from two to three years old; the pigs and sheep were about one year old. When I contrasted the enormous bulk of each animal with the short period in which so much fat or flesh had been produced, I certainly indulged in a physiological reflection on the high pressure work against time which certain internal organs, as the stomach, liver, heart and lungs, must have undergone at such a very early age. I therefore resolved to follow up these animals to their several destinations, and to inspect their condition after death."

Mr. Grant examined the carcasses of the slaughtered prize bullocks, heifers, pigs, and sheep which remained in London, and gives the result of his observations at great length. The whole of his important paper ought to be read with great attention, not only by the breeders and feeders of prize cattle, but by all consumers of beef, mutton and pork, who delight in the flesh of animals that "cut up well in the shambles."—We ask space for the conclusion in this clever paper:—

"Let an animal be fed beyond the limits compatible with health, and the superfluous fat is no longer confined to the interstices of muscular fibres, but actually invades and eventually supersedes them. The fibres then contain fat instead of the fibrilæ, (known to anatomists), in which reside the contractile power of muscle, and its nutritive value of human food. We therefore say that such meat no longer retains its healthy structure and nutritive quality, but has actually degenerated into fat, although still presenting the semblance of ordinary muscle, and thereby deceiving both buyer and seller.

"We should therefore expect in vain to replenish our own muscles by the use of such food, nor should animals thus overfed be regarded as prize specimens of rearing and feeding. The heart, being converted into fat no longer retains its contractile power, but beats feebly and irregularly.—The blood, therefore, now moves onward in a slow and feeble current. Hence the panting breathlessness due to stagnation of blood in the lungs, while the skin and extremities are cold. Hence the stupid, heavy-headed expression of a congested brain, and the blood-stained appearance of meat after death. The slightest exertion to an animal under such circumstances might suddenly prove fatal. Were a man in this condition to present himself at an insurance office, I would refuse to insure his life at any premium. Yet, under similar circumstances, a sheep is awarded gold and silver medals, and its feeder a prize of £20. We should not, therefore, rest satisfied with heaping fat on an animal, nor be content if he "does well," with fat symmetrically distributed over the back and loins and around his internal organs. I would observe well, during life, the excretions, and see if their condition gave proof of overfeeding. If so I should consider that the stomach and kidneys were overworked.—Nor would I neglect the less perceptible evidence afforded by the skin, the respiration, and the state of the brain as indicated by the general expression of the animal and the mode of carrying its head.

Then, after death, I would pursue my inquiry further, and see whether my opinion of the animal formed during life, was corroborated or reversed by the appearance of its internal organs, the condition of the heart, lungs, stomach, intestines, liver, and kidneys more especially. All this kind of knowledge is required by physicians and surgeons in their estimate of health and disease, and is equally necessary to settle the question at issue. Instead, therefore, of pursuing the present system of rearing cattle, much as it may test the qualities of food and other matters of minor importance, let the breeders, feeders, exhibitors, and prize judges, alike visit the slaughter-houses; let them do this with a due knowledge of diseased appearances, and let them thus discover that system of rearing which is most compatible with the health of cattle, and which produces the largest amount of the most nutritious food for man. Under the present system the public have no guarantee, and are not insured the best, if indeed the cheapest. The bulky withers of a fat bullock are no criterion of health, for his fat, tabular back may conceal the revolting ravages of disease. All this can alone be disclosed by an inspection of the animal's interior after death. The flesh of animals which has been produced by organs themselves diseased is itself also necessarily deteriorated, and ought not to be regarded as prime samples of human food. These facts will be best understood by pathologists, but they also come home to the understandings, and certainly to the stomachs of the people."

To the Editor of the Examiner.

When I glance at the pages of wisdom and truth,
On their leaves I find scatter'd sweet words for my soul;
A promise embodying a guardian for life,
And a crown in the end when I reach the blest Goal.

How should I rejoice as I look o'er their pages,
And find such sweet promises pointing to me,
How quick should I fly from the passion that rages
And read my relief, my dear Bible, in thee!

By those who are tossed on the ocean of sorrow;
Thy words are a balm, and they often are needed
To heal in the night of affliction and sorrow

Like the mist in the morning, our life is but short,
When compared with the day ushered in at our death;
The mon ents of time seem to make us their sport,
And leave us to grapple for life and for breath.

But the truths of my Bible are changeless and true,
They have known not a change with the changes of time;
They have borne with the jeers of the many and few,
And still chime the themes that of old they did chime.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—Since you have seen fit to publish Mr. J. T. Henthorn's letter, I trust you will give me a chance to reply. The charge I made against Mr. Henthorn was that he used up the Corporation plank for purposes of his own, and that he had admitted to me that he had used up two loads of plank about the house he built last Summer; this is a charge every one of your readers can understand. Now, Sir, how does he meet the charge? By getting affidavits from two men that he bought some lumber of them, and then he tells you how much he bought of Mr. Ledgate and Mr. Somebody-else! I never asked him for this information, and it is certainly nobody's business how much or how little lumber he bought; but what about his using the Corporation plank for his own private purposes, without paying for it? Now, Mr. J. T. Henthorn is a man who boasts that he never told a lie in his life, and that he could not be hired to tell an untruth. Now what say you, Mr. Henthorn, are you Guilty or Not Guilty? Let us have simple yes or no. You are in a corner, and I want to keep you there; come out like a man and tell the truth!

I intend to notice the other part of Mr. H.'s letter more fully, just as soon as we get the plank account settled, but I don't want to mix up any rubbish for him to hide in until he is either caught or at liberty.

I am, Mr. Editor, yours,
WM. CUMMING.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—Permit me the use of a small space in your valuable Journal to reply to some remarks made about me in the last Review by a Good Templar. He states that I appear to have taken umbrage at some remarks made at the Temples late Soiree, and if I had been there I would have had no cause for complaint. Now, Sir, as to my not being there Good Templar knows the reason why, but I cannot see what difference that would have made if your report was a correct one, and it has not as yet been substantially contracted, my cause of complaint would still have been the same. I should only have had to put the Sons in their true position at the meeting, instead of the paper. Therefore, Mr. Editor, it rests with you to prove your report of the speeches correct, all I can say about it is that I have heard from others that your report is pretty near the truth, and more, that one of the speakers in his zeal against Legal Prohibition stated that the Sons had lost ground on account of their advocacy of that principle and were far below the position they once occupied in the Province. Now, Sir, allow me in the pompous language of Water Street most emphatically to deny such assertions, and to state without fear of contradiction that the Sons as a body never occupied so strong ground as they do now, and never were better able to battle with the foe. As to the Prohibitory Law being only a question of time, I agree with it, but that time will be long or short just in proportion as Temperance men act consistently in voting for men of sound Temperance principles in preference to your expedient wine bibing candidates whose practices give the lie to their votes. I disclaim any intention of insinuating that the Templars are making a retrograde movement. I simply left them where your report placed them, and if it is not their true position it would better become a Good Templar to be placing them right than wasting his time in showing his little feeling against the Sons over my back. I trust he and his friends will continue to put in practice and carry out those great and glorious principles of moral suasion and total abstinence which they first learnt in the Division Room. It affords me great satisfaction to hear that the Good Templars are making such good progress, and instead of feeling anything like envy, I can rejoice at it, not slander them, for I can assure a Good Templar that the Sons disposed of the last of that article something over a year ago. I thank him for his invitation to follow in the wake of the Good Templars; the Sons will no doubt do so whenever they feel themselves behind, but as yet they have only heard of the Templars. Whenever they come up and pass ahead, we will assuredly lay hold of their skirts.

Review of the Produce Markets.

Toronto, Thursday, February 4, 1858.

Nothing has occurred in the Produce Markets to call for special remark. Prices are generally about the same as on this day week, and there is no change in either demand or supply. We hope now, however, that as an abundance of snow has fallen, the deliveries will increase, and as a consequence, cheaper markets may be expected.

WHEAT.—The price of good to choice fall wheat ranges from 80c to 85c (4s to 4s 3d) per bushel. Some lots of very fine samples have brought 90c (4s 6d), but these were exceptions to the general rule. Inferior lots, sprouted, damp, and much shrunk, are not saleable at over 65c to 70c (3s 3d to 4s 6d) per bushel. There is but little competition among buyers, and the anxiety manifested to secure wheat is hardly so evident as formerly. Yet if the supplies should increase so as to make it worth while for dealers to operate largely, a better demand might spring up, but there is no prospect of improved prices. As a general thing, this market is not depressed by increased supplies, and as our buyers are men of means, there is always a certainty of a market here, even supposing there was no demand in other parts of the Province.

The deliveries during the week amount to—bushels, the quality of which has not been of the finest description. Should sleighing succeed this storm, however, we may expect largely increased receipts, probably of a much better sample.

WHEAT.—In store last report, bushels	6,540
Received since	8,741
	15,281
Shipped	990
At present in store	14,291

FLOUR.—There is no change in the flour market. Excepting a speculative enquiry for shipment to the Lower Province at the lowest possible rates, there is an utter absence of other than a local demand. No sales have been reported by which to test the market, and we have but to repeat our quotations of last week, which are generally the asking prices for ordinary brands. Superfine $3 50. Fancy, $3 75. Extra, $4 00 per barrel. The Montreal Market is unchanged, except that the receipts are lighter and there is less pressing on the market.—Quotations are—Superfine $4 35 to $4 40. Fancy, $4 50 to $4 65. Extra $4 90 to $5 10. An inquiry still exists for May and June delivery without leading to transactions. For Chicago wheat, 85c has been offered for May delivery. In New York, Canadian Flour is quoted at $4 10 to $4 90 for Superfine to Extra.

The following are the receipts. Shipments of Flour from the wharves for the past two weeks:—

FLOUR.—In store last report, barrels	4,650
Received since	4,950
	9,600
Shipped	90
At present in store	9,510

SPRING WHEAT.—There is a good demand for Spring Wheat at 70c to 75c, (3s 6d to 3s 9d) per bushel for the best. A good sample could easily command the outside figure.

BARLEY is not so much in request, and as the qualities offering are of widely different character, the current range extends from 30c to 50c, (1s 6d to 2s 6d) per bushel.

RYE is scarce; but still not so much in demand. We quote it 55c to 60c, (2s 9d to 3s,) the latter being the exceptional price.

OATS.—There continues to be a better supply of oats brought in and prices have not recovered their firmness. The general rate is from 26c to 30c (1s 4d to 1s 6d) per bushel, the latter not being very frequently realized.

PEAS are quiet and very few change hands at 45c to 50c (2s 3d to 2s 6d) per bushel.

CHEESE is variously quoted at 8c to 9½ per 100 lbs. There is a good deal in the market and it has but a slow movement.

POULTRY continues scarce. We quote chickens at 25c to 30c (2s 9d to 3s 6d) per pair. Geese 70c to 75c (3s 6d to 3s 9d) each. Turkeys 75c to $1, (3s 9d to 5s) each. Any increased supply would lower these rates which are only obtainable for the best fowl.

EGGS 20c to 22c (1s to 1s 1d) per dozen.

PORK continues firm with lighter supplies. Good dressed hogs are worth $5 to $5 25, even $5 50 for the best, per 100 lbs. Sales of inferior have taken place at $4 50 to $4 75.

BEEF.—Nothing doing in cattle. Slaughtered beef dull of sale at $3 75 to $4 for fore quarter, and $4 50 to $5 for hind quarter.

VENISON.—A lot of deer of medium condition, found ready sale at $7 to $9 each.

SHEEP AND CALVES.—Nothing doing. Sheep nominal at $4 to $5. Calves to $4 each.

WOOL.—15c (9d) per lb. for the best washed. Beef Hides $4 per 100 lbs. Sheep skins, 25c to 50c (1s 3d to 2s 6d) each. Calf Skins, 10c (6d) per lb.

WOOD.—Good loads are still purchaseable on the market, at $3 75 to $4 25 each, which is the cheapest way to purchase wood.

POTATOES have been more plentiful and at lower rates, say 55c to 60c (2s 9d to 3s) freely accepted for good varieties by the load.

APPLES.—For the best, $2 to $2 25 is paid per barrel. Inferior bring $1 75.

BUTTER.—Fresh butter has not been plentiful and 21c to 23c (1s 1d to 1s 2d) has been paid. Tub is in large supply, and hardly saleable at 14c to 15c (8½d to 9d) per lb.

THE ANNUAL REPORT

Of the Finance Committee, to the Joint Board of Union and Grammar School Trustees, of the Town of Peterborough.

The Finance Committee of the Peterboro' Grammar and Union Schools herewith submit a statement of the Receipts and Expenditures for the year 1857, as required by the School Act. It will be observed that under the head of Expenditure the Board are obliged to have recourse to Bank accommodation to the extent of £374 2s 3d, in consequence of the Town tax for one year not being made available until the second year is entered upon. This is exceedingly inconvenient and unpleasant, requiring individual members of the Board to give their names to the Bank to procure funds to pay the Teachers salaries which the public are aware cannot be allowed to remain in arrears. At the moment that the report is made up £250 is in unpaid Bank note accommodation arising from the School tax for 1857 not being placed to the credit of the Board.

It is a matter of regret that the Board feel themselves unable to provide and towards a School Library under the liberal provisions of a recent Act which allows the Chief Superintendent to grant books in amount equal to double the sum contributed by a Corporation or Municipality for that object: the great difficulty of meeting the current expenditure of the School and endeavouring to keep it in an efficient condition has hitherto prevented the Board in estimating to the Council for aid towards a School Library.

The accommodation of the present Building in which the School has been held for some time, having been found entirely inadequate for the purpose required the Board has taken steps to remedy the want by contracting for a new Building to be completed by the first of November next.

The Board having received the consent of the County Council and also the Town Council, endeavoured to procure the site of the intended Building on three acres of land in front of the Court House, but owing to opposition a Bill could not be carried through Parliament to obtain a patent for the land, consequently the design had to be given up and the Board fall back on the old Grammar School site, the result of which has been they are compelled to call for a much larger sum from the town than would otherwise have been needed.

A statement of the cost of new Buildings with grounds, furniture, &c, complete, is laid before you, and also the ways and means for carrying it out, from which it may be seen that the contract for the main building has been given out for £2981 5s, and it is estimated that £1,000 additional will render the whole complete. To meet this the Board had £1,048 in hand, a mortgage for £134, and a School Lot in the North Ward, put down as value for £200, leaving £318 18 to be provided for by the Town in equal proportions at 6, 12 and 18 months from the first of November, 1857.

A statement of the Building Fund is also given herewith, made up with interest to 1st November, 1857. The entire amount is credited at £1078 17s from which has to be deducted a payment made to the Building Committee of £250 on account of contract, leaving still available £828 17s, to be applied according to the terms of the contract.

In conclusion the Committee would observe that they trust the Building now commenced, when finished, will prove an ornament to the Town, and also mark an important era in its statistical records as a pleasing monument to the progress of education and moral advancement among the community at large. It is intended that the internal arrangements & fittings shall be of the most approved and modern construction, so that every facility shall be afforded for proper classification, health and comfort, and it is hoped that those interested in the judicious movement will aid the Board in a way possible manner and encourage the promotion of an undertaking so lately

ELLIS'

PATENT

ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituent of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particle with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices, Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanitary and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or at sea, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at

The Burning of the 'Montreal.'

THE JUDGE'S CHARGE.

(From the Quebec Chronicle.)

Mr. Justice Duval then proceeded to sum up the case to the Jury. He trusted they would not be swayed by the horrors of the dreadful calamity, the melancholy consequences of which they had been investigating, nor by any remarks that had been made in the progress of the trial, but remembering the oaths they had taken, return a verdict in accordance with the evidence, their consciences and belief. As to the prisoners Duval and Rocheleau, the pilots of the Montreal, the witness Stevenson had told the jury that they were not in the wheel-house when the vessel was turned towards the shore. If that were the case, it would be well the pilots should understand that in abandoning their post they were guilty of a criminal act. But it would be difficult to come to the conclusion that these prisoners really acted as alleged by the Crown, in the face of the testimony for the defence that Duval was engaged in endeavouring to extinguish the fire, on the lurricane deck, and that Rocheleau was in the wheel-house. It would be for the jury of course to decide what degree of credibility, the testimony for and against the pilots merited. If it was not Duval or Rocheleau, that turned the boat to the shore, who did do so? There was positive evidence that she was turned immediately on the word being given by the Captain, and if the jury believed she was steered by the pilots there would be an end of the case as to two of the prisoners. But it was much to be regretted that the case of the Captain stood on different grounds. Certain liabilities were imposed on him by law,—he was required to discharge certain duties, and the law pronounced his failure or neglect to be manslaughter. As to the question whether an act of omission, merely, can constitute criminality, it was his duty to tell the jury that it could. There was no doubt on the point,—and Lord Campbell had a few years since given a decision to that effect,—that where there is an omission of an act imposed on a person as a duty, such omission is criminal. Independently of the principles on this head laid down in the criminal law, at civil law the liability of a person in the position of the master of the Montreal was unquestionable. It was requisite in order to recover insurance that the vessel should be seaworthy, that she should be in all respects equipped and fit to perform the stipulated undertaking. [His Honor here read an authority on the subject.] That precaution which the law required to protect property, and guard the right of shippers and insurers, should surely be required for the protection of the lives of human beings. If the question had been put to the Captain, before he left the wharf at Quebec: "Sir, if your steamboat takes fire in the middle of the St. Lawrence, what means have you provided for saving your four hundred passengers, forty-two crew and yourself?"—what could he have answered? And yet every person who went on board the Montreal, entrusted his life to the Captain, and had a right to presume that the law had been complied with. The Legislature had passed statutes for the protection of the traveller; it was not to be supposed that had been disregarded. It was to no purpose for the Captain to tell the jury that he had not obeyed the law because the Attorney General did not compel him to do so; this could not be received as a justification or in palliation of his offence. No one pretended that the captain had acted wilfully or maliciously; the charge was that by culpable negligence he had caused the death of the deceased man named in the indictment. With reference to what had been stated as to the absence of proof that deceased had come to his death from the act of the prisoner, that was an untenable assumption; no rational man could doubt, after having heard that deceased was a passenger on board the steamer, and that his body was found drowned where she ran ashore, that he was a victim of the catastrophe. It mattered not in the case, to justify a conviction, whether Leslie jumped over to escape the fire, or was pushed or dragged into the water by another passenger. The prisoner, it might be presumed did not intend such a result of his act, but this was of no consequence; there was the culpable negligence on his part which in law amounted to manslaughter. As to the pretension that the boat was racing, His Honor said he thought it hardly necessary to refer to Cote's evidence on the subject, for whether racing or not, the charge of gross neglect was certainly brought home to the Captain. He (the learned Judge), might say he was of opinion that the boat was not racing.—A serious matter for the consideration of the jury was that, though the boat had been running but two weeks she had twice taken fire. It would have been but the act of a prudent man not to run her after such occurrences without having her examined. Would a careful person allow his house to take fire, twice, without troubling himself as to the cause or the necessity of repairs? And yet how much more essential was it that the liability of the wood work of a steamer to ignite should be instantly attended to, and the defect remedied. Not the least explanation of these circumstances had been given. [Mr. Parkin interrupted, by saying there was proof that sheet iron plate had been nailed over the wood work.] It had been shown that the wooden casing of one of the boilers only had been covered not long before the disaster. It was important the jury should pay attention to the fact, because they would have to say whether the master's conduct was that of a prudent person or not. Again, it appeared there was no fire engine aboard, nor fire axes. This was the more to be deplored, as there was no doubt, from the small quantity of smoke perceptible when the fire was first discovered, that had there been proper appliances at hand, not only the vessel would have been saved, but the two hundred and fifty lives that were lost by the disaster. The evidence adduced against the prisoner showed culpable negligence and violation of the law on his part, and how could a jury or a Court of justice permit him to return to society saying no responsibility attached to him? It would be a monstrous thing to say that a person who was proved to have acted with the carelessness and negligence which the evidence showed was evinced by the prisoner, was not answerable for his conduct when loss of life ensued. Every steamboat Captain must be told that the law will look to him for the safety of those who are confided or confide themselves to his care. If persons of this class had been heretofore in the habit of acting carelessly and contrary to law, it was only the more necessary they should know they have been doing wrong. A heavy responsibility attached to Captain Rudolph, if the jury believed the facts alleged were distinctly proved: and it would be for them to say, after a calm and dispassionate deliberation whether the evidence which in law, was sufficient to convict the Captain of the charge preferred against him, was, believed by them or not. If they were clearly of opinion that the testimony merited any credibility which his Honor thought it did, they were bound to return a verdict of guilty regardless of the consequences. As to the pilots, he had already said the jury must be the judges of the evidence.

Judge Duval having repeated his charge in French,

The Jury asked till to-morrow (Friday) morning to consider their verdict, and returned, in charge of constables, at 6 p. m., at which hour the Court adjourned.

FRIDAY, Feb. 5.

At the opening of the Court, it was intimated that the Jury had not agreed upon a verdict. In the course of the day, the Jury themselves told the Judge they were divided in opinion; and in the evening, a similar announcement being made, before the adjournment of the Court, they were again committed to the custody of the Sheriff.

A "Retreat."

The following extract from a letter dated "24th November, 1857," by one who may be described as an eye-witness, mentions some interesting facts, which have not before been made known:—

"The people in the Residency do not appear to have taken any part in the late assault made by Sir Colin Campbell and his troops. The latter did not light direct to the Residency through the city—as Outram and Havelock did—but first skirted the city, and then advanced through its suburbs, where were palaces—the great barracks for the King's troops in former days—and some large squares. Each of these positions was strongly fortified and strictly defended by the enemy, but, with the help of plenty of mortars to prepare the way, our column gradually advanced, taking post after post, till at last they got to the entrance of the densely-populated city proper of Lucknow. A small part of it still separated Sir Colin from the Residency, with which he was naturally anxious to open communication at once, the day being far spent. He accordingly pushed on to the gateway, but there, seeing every roof and window bristling with thousands of men prepared to dispute every inch of way through the narrow streets, he bade the "retreat" be sounded, and drew off his men, who sullenly and discontentedly obeyed the order. Instantly the crowds of warriors disappeared from the tops of the houses, issued to the number of 8000 or 9000 from the gateway; and with yells and shouts pressed hotly upon our retiring column; but of those 8000 how few re-entered the gate from which they sallied so confident of triumph! The retirement was but a feint on the part of Sir Colin to draw the enemy from their stronghold. No sooner were they clear of the buildings than the words "halt"—"charge," were speedily given, and British bayonets were seen among the enemy. Their rabble tried in vain to re-enter the city—their very numbers and desperation preventing their ingress. Then the gun and grape-shot opened upon them, and they were mowed down like grass. Our people pushed on after the fugitives through the city, and soon had possession of all up to the Residency. The Ghoorkas and Sikhs entered each house as they advanced, and not a man in it, or a wounded man outside, escaped death at their hands. It is calculated that in the siege altogether Sir Colin's force destroyed not less than 7000 of the enemy.

The Conversion of India.

From the London Times.

The conversion of India may almost be called now a res nata questio. Everybody is looking at it in every possible aspect. On some sides it is very like looking through a brick wall; an inert, inaccessible mass, presents itself, a perfect fabric of tradition, subtlety, and priestly power, fixed like a rock in the soil. What is to shake this fabric? Hannibal, according to the legend, penetrated the Alps with vinegar; shall we try undermining or battery, explosives or dissolvents? On other sides a little light breaks through. The Church Missionary Society at its meeting on Tuesday extracted rays of hope from the proof of the stability of our Indian conversions so severely tried at the late massacres. Delhi, Allahabad, Bareilly, Futteyghur, Umritsir, and other places have now witnessed native Christian martrydom. That is a proof, at any rate, that a Hindoo can become a Christian, that he has a capacity for it, that no peculiarity of organization attaching to the race, as some of our ethnological speculators have argued, stands between the Hindoo and Christianity. On the other hand, nothing as yet has been done—for we cannot call the mere handful of converts in which all our efforts have hitherto resulted anything; so that the argument stands thus—nothing has been done, but something may be done. The Hindoo shows capabilities; on the surface he is a mere doll, a stereotyped piece of tradition; his reason is extinct; he is like a man all but drowned, but there is life in him at the bottom; there is something left in him to appeal to. The religious question, in fact, stands upon a ground rather analogous to what some great scientific questions occupied in the middle ages. It was seen in those days that there were great things in nature,—that there was a secret which was to come out; but how it was to come out, how the developement would arise, nobody knew. Our modern civilization existed then only in argument—in the reason of scientific men; it was a prophecy; it was a prophecy at a time against facts; but on looking back we can see now that this prophecy had a real ground, had evidence and signs of its own which prompted and directed it. So now the idea of any wholesale, general conversion of India, is against facts; it is a prophecy, even a bold prophecy, but it is a prophecy upon grounds and data—a prophecy which has rational arguments to support it.

To select one argument out of the many which favour this result—one remarkable piece of vantage ground which Christianity has over Brahmism in the forthcoming trial of strength—one from which not very much has come as yet, but from which not a little may reasonably be expected to come. Christianity has this remarkable characteristic—that it is able to bear all the discoveries of modern science without giving way. But Brahmanism does not stand this test. It gives way. Brahmanism is, for example, inextricably involved in some astronomical statements and schemes which are proved by modern science to be totally false beyond all possibility of denial. This falsity is no difficult or recondite thing to teach; the first elementary truths of astronomy which the very earliest handbook and catechism of astronomy teaches prove it completely, and expose the absolute mistakes of Brahmin inspiration. What does the Hindoo do under these circumstances? He ceases that moment to believe in Brahmanism. The testimony of all persons acquainted with the working of the Government schools in India speaks unanimously to this immediate effect of the first insight into astronomy upon the Hindoo. His religion does not stand the test, which Christianity does stand, as it gives way, it goes to the wall. Some will ask why does he not draw the same distinctions that Christians do, and say that Brahminism is not intended to teach astronomy, but religion? We do not know why, but as a matter of fact he does not. He becomes a disbeliever. That is the alternative with him. It is the argument of fact over again. The strength of the Christian revelation, the weakness of Brahmanism, is shown in the fact that Christians go on believing in their revelation, in spite of everything that turns up, while Hindoos give up their professed revelation upon the first clear understanding on their part that its statements conflict with known scientific truths.

What is the direct consequence of such an important piece of vantage ground as this in the possession of Christianity? Why, that Christianity can, without any fear of danger to itself, bring the whole battery of science into most destructive play upon the rival religion; can, without the least apprehension of a rebound upon itself, wield the whole machinery of physical truth and modern discovery against Brahminism, and the peculiar constitution of the Hindoo mind even gives facilities for this purpose The Hindoo is remarkably quick in some departments of physical science, those connected with mathematics and figures; he learns astronomy with facility, readiness, and even eagerness. What an engine, then, when once we know the action and effect of it, we have at command against a false religion! Who can tell what the alternate consequences may be of such a power on the part of Christianity, and of a judicious and effective use of it? Will it be said that we shall make the Hindoos disbelievers in their own religion, without transferring their faith to another.—that we may make them infidels, but shall not make them Christians? The answer is that, by all accounts, the Hindoo is a being who must have a religion of some kind or other. A belief few may be able there, as here, to do without and a religion, but the mass must have one; religion is part of their nature. The Hindoo has singular powers of faith; stiffened and debased as they are under his present system, he takes a future state for granted, and, as if the simple fact of his existing at all were an infallible pledge for it, he has a perfect instinctive belief in an invisible world. To set at work deliberately to make infidels of people on the mere chance that after they have left their own religious sect or party they may join yours is indeed an abominable and intolerable policy. It is the policy which has been attributed to the Jesuits in their proselytizing dealings with Protestants. But a liberty must be allowed us, at the same time, to teach the simple truths of nature. Those truths are divine truths, the physical universe is the creation of God, and we have the clear right to teach all the world, so far as any are known, the facts and laws of that universe. If the knowledge of such facts should subvert any existing religion in the world, and if subversion of one belief should even in some cases not be followed by the adoption of another, but end in simple infidelity, the responsibility of such a result would not lie upon those who simply teach what is true and what they have a plain right to teach, but upon the hollowness and falsehood of the religion which could not bear the application of the test. In the meantime we may rejoice that Christianity can use the laws of nature as its weapons, and that it can, when it likes, bring the knowledge of those laws to bear with crushing force upon a base and degrading superstition. We may see in such a power one seed of future triumph, and one ground of rational prophecy.

GENERAL HAVELOCK.—No event connected with the terrible drama of India has stirred up to its foundation the heart of England like the unexpected death of Gen. Havelock. Just as his noble work was done, and before the applause and honours of his admiring country had reached him he was ignominously cut down, the victim of disease, and expired on a bed of sickness instead of dying as his gallant soul must have yearned, on the field of battle, with his feet to the foe. It is extraordinary how public instinct had selected this great soldier for the true hero of India, and his return home would have been the occasion of public enthusiasm such as has rarely been witnessed here. The government of the day has lost some popularity by the slow and niggardly manner that Havelock was rewarded. After an unwise delay he was baronetted, and then, after some hesitation, an annuity of £1,000 was conferred upon him. All this seemed paltry after services so brilliant, and contrasts were soon drawn to the immense compensations bestowed on Generals of more aristocratic pretentions. The Times, at last, broke into a loud remonstrance, and boldly told the government that India had been saved by the middle classes, whilst its finger of scorn was pointed at the aristocratic nodles who disgraced England in the Crimea. The noble Havelock has died before the mites of his baronetcy, or the £1,000 a year, had reached him, and his humiliation, at least, he was spared. Lord Palmerston could hardly do a better thing to retrieve himself in popular esteem than confer these small honours on his son at the first meeting of Parliament.

The Utah Expedition.

CHARACTER AND DISPOSITION OF THE NATIVE INDIANS.

Correspondence of the New Orleans Picayune.

Camp on Green River, U. T.,
Oct. 31, 1857.

The squadron of dragoons from Fort Laramie arrived at our camp on the Sweet Water on the 25th of October, and on the morning of the 26th we resumed our march, after a halt of eight days. You will be able to form some idea of the length of the train which moved under the escort of the two companies of the Tenth, and the squadron of dragoons, when I inform you that the advance had marched ten and a half miles, and gone into camp on Pacific creek, before the rear guard left the Sweet Water.

Night before last we camped on the Big Sandy, about four hundred yards from the spot where one of the supply trains was burned, and the blackened embers of the corral of wagons was still there to mark where the deed had been consummated.—About ten o'clock at night a group of us were sitting around a fire, the fuel of which was saved out from the remnants of the Mormon conflagration, when one of our sentinels, posted on the brow of a bluff overhanging the ravine where we were encamped, was heard to challenge twice in rapid succession—"Who comes there?" "Who comes there?" Bang. A detachment of the guard proceeded with all haste to the spot, and the sentinel reported that he had seen fifteen or twenty men approaching his post, and that when he challenged them, instead of replying they crouched down among the sage bushes, and still continued to move towards him. He then fired upon them, whereupon they retreated rapidly in various directions. As it was a bright moonlight night, and the men fired upon came within twenty paces of the sentinel, there could not have been any mistake as to what he saw, and there is no doubt that the party fired upon were Mormons, attempting to reconnoitre our camp.

Since then we have heard of them again in our vicinity, their last achievement having been to run off, day before yesterday, a drove of cattle and horses belonging to a trader of the Gentile persuasion, who lives about four miles from here on Green river. They have declared their intention to press into the service of the Lord, in this campaign, all the live stock they can lay their hands on, whether belonging to saint or sinner. Fortunately for us, in this horse stealing and stock stampeding business, we have allies—the Utah Indians—who can give them nine points in the game and beat them all hollow. The Utes may challenge honourable comparison with any nation on the face of the globe in the art and mystery of horse stealing. With them indeed, it is carried on with such consummate tact and such exquisite skill, that it may fairly claim to be classed, as DeQuincy classes a certain style of murder—as one of the fine arts.

Some years ago a celebrated Utah chief now defunct, started off with the intent to steal, on a journey into Lower California. He was none of your petty larceny scoundrels, but the pride and glory of his people, and practised his art in a style partaking largely of the grandoise.

On the occasion in question he and his party, composed of a few choice spirits of his nation, actually succeeded in stampeding and driving off a drove of fifteen hundred head of horses. They had been about two days on their return journey when they perceived they were pursued. They at once abandoned their booty and carefully secreted themselves at a short distance from the road. The pursuers came up to the drove about dark, and supposing that the stampeders had been stampeded in turn and made good their escape towards their own country, at once went into camp, intending to start on their return with the recovered property in the morning. That night the Utah Chief not only stole again the original drove, but likewise all the horses ridden by their pursuers, and left them the option of continuing the chase on foot or of returning by that mode of locomotion to their point of departure.

The chief who accomplished this elegant feat, which I venture to say cannot be surpassed in the annals of horse stealing was named Walker—on the tucus a non lucendo principle, I presume, as he invariably rode.

He is now dead; but some of the very men who were with him on the occasion alluded to are now in our camp and eager to be of service to us. As the Mormons rely altogether on the number, swiftness and bottom of their horses to enable them to wage warfare on a system of guerilla warfare, and as they themselves have begun this stampeding business, it will be a fine thing if, some bright morning before long, they find our dragoons down upon them, full tilt, and their own horses all gone. The Utah Indians who can serve us in this manner, cherish against the Mormons a hatred very earnest and honest. They never speak of them except as "cut throats," throat cutting appearing to be the favorite and most orthodox mode of destruction resorted to by Bill Hickman and his "angels." The Utahs bear testimony of atrocities committed by the Mormons fully equal to anything that has been hitherto charged against them by their worst enemies. They state positively that as recently as the month of September last, a party of about eighty emigrants, on their way to California, were cut off by the Bayeet Indians, acting at the instigation of and in open concert with the Mormons, and that after the emigrants had been most treacherously induced by the latter to lay down their arms, they were all, except some young children, butchered in cold blood and their throats cut.

As to the abomination of their system of sexual intercourse, the worst you have heard is no more than the truth. I have my information from gentlemen for whose veracity I can vouch, who have been residents in Salt Lake Valley, and eye witnesses of what they relate.

One bishop (Johnson by name) has for wives four sisters, his own nieces. Another saint has his own half sister, and another a mother and her daughter for wives! Of the truth of these statements there is no room whatever to doubt. The facts are so. In comparison with the cities of the Latter Day Saints, Sodom and Gomorrah were

It is after all, truly fortunate that these wretches—a disgrace to the age and to their race, and a blot upon the face of the earth—have, in the phrenzy of their folly and fanticism, placed themselves in an attitude that will justify our government in "wiping them out." The army of Utah is small in comparison with the numbers against which it has to contend. It has more formidable difficulties to encounter in the topography of the country in which its operations must be carried on, and more redoubtable enemies in the season and elements it must encounter and overcome. But of one thing you may rest assured—there is no back out in the army of Utah; and, in spite of all odds against it, and all the asperities and rigors of the locality and the season, it will crush the fanatics and traitors into the dust, or perish in the attempt.

A Brave Act.

Latest English papers say that the decoration of the Victoria cross had been conferred upon some inferior officers and privates, among them Lieut. Havelock, of the 10th regiment, who was aid-de-camp to the late General Havelock, who thus describes one of his acts of bravery in a despatch last August:—

In the combat at Cawnpore, Lieutenant Havelock was my aid-de-camp. The sixty-fourth regiment had been much under artillery fire, from which it had severely suffered. The whole of the infantry were lying down in line when, perceiving that the enemy had brought out the last reserved gun, a 24-pounder, and were rallying round it I called up the regiment to rise and advance. Without any other word from me, Lieutenant Havelock placed himself on his horse, in front of the centre of the sixty-fourth, opposite the muzzle of the gun. Major Stirling, commanding the regiment, was in front, dismounted, but the Lieutenant continued to move steadily on in front of the regiment at a foot pace, on his horse. The gun discharged shot until the troops were within a short distance, they fired grape. It went the corps, led by the lieutenant, who still steered steadily on the gun's muzzle until it was mastered by a rush of the sixty-fourth.

The bravery of two of the privates who have been thus honoured was thus reported by General Grant in June last:—

"The guns, I am happy to say, were saved but a waggon of Major Scott's battery was blown up. I must not fail to mention the excellent conduct of a Sowar of the fourth Irregular cavalry and two men of the ninth lancers, privates Thomas Hancock and John Purcell, who, when my horse was shot down, remained by me throughout.—One of these men and the Sowar offered me their horses, and I was dragged out by the Sowar's horse. Private Hancock was severely wounded, and private Purcell's horse was killed under him. The Sowar's name is Roopur Khan.

Court of Queen's Bench, Quebec.

From the Quebec Chronicle, Feb. 1.

CHARGE OF MANSLAUGHTER BY A BOY.—Joseph Simard, aged 13, was indicted for killing and slaying Alexis Guay, at St. Paul's Bay, on the 10th of August last.—Mr. Stuart, Q. C., for the prosecution, said that this was a peculiar and melancholy case; the prisoner had shot a boy about the same age as himself, and it would be for the jury to judge, from the circumstances, whether he was amenable to the charge of felony now brought against him. The learned gentleman called, as the first witness on behalf of the Crown, Adelaide Guay, a little girl 12 years of age, the sister of the deceased. She cried during the whole time she was giving her evidence, which was as follows:—"I know the prisoner; he lived in our neighbourhood at St. Paul's Bay. On the 10th of August he came from school with my brother. When he came into our house the prisoner took down a gun from the place where it was usually kept. I told him father had forbidden us to touch the gun; it was loaded.—He said he did not care, it was not always loaded, and even if it were it would not go off. He looked twice at the lock, saying, "I'm going to kill that fellow." I then went out, and immediately afterwards heard a shot fired. A minute or two subsequently the prisoner came to me saying "Your brother is killed outright." I returned to the house and found my little brother on the floor. He was wounded in the abdomen, and appeared to be dying. I lifted him in my arms, and he died almost immediately afterwards. There was no one in the house at the time but the prisoner and my brother." Augustin Simard, a farmer, was also examined and said:—"At about half-past four o'clock on the afternoon of the 16th of August last, I heard the report of a gun. About ten minutes afterwards the deceased's sister came to me and said little Alec was dead. I went to the house and saw the deceased. The prisoner denied that he had killed the other little boy, and said that the deceased had put the gun to his own shoulder, and shot himself." Dr. Buckley said that the cause of death was a gun shot wound in the abdomen. Mr. Wilkes then addressed the jury for the prisoner and contended that the charge could not be sustained. There was no proof of a sudden quarrel with the deceased, and he believed the whole affair was an entire accident, the prisoner imagining that the gun was not loaded, and not being aware of the danger of using firearms. The jury retired, and after an absence of about ten minutes returned a verdict of Not Guilty. His Honor the Judge, in ordering the prisoner to be discharged from custody said he hoped this melancholy occurrence would be a warning to him in after life, and teach him the danger of playing with fire-arms.

The Revolution in Mexico.

The New York Tribune thus epitomizes the recent news from Mexico:—

The full accounts which have come to hand of the late movements in Mexico, present that country, or at least the city of Mexico itself, in a sad state of confusion. The attempt of Comonfort to place himself at the head of a moderate party which might hold a middle place between the Radicals or Puros, as they call themselves, and the extreme Conservatives, has proved a complete failure. In the struggle going on, at the last accounts, in the city of Mexico, Comonfort was no longer contending for the Plan of Tacubaya and his own dictatorship, both of which seem to have fallen dead in consequence of the [illegible] and cries of the Republic; he was fighting as the ally and General of the very Puros whose favourite Constitution he had lately set aside, against a new pronunciamento, made as well against himself as against them, and in favour of Santa Anna, by the same Gen. Zulloaga who had originated the Plan of Tacubaya and the dictatorship of Comonfort.

At the last accounts the struggle had gone on in the city for eight days, with some occasional armistices and attempts at accommodation, but without any marked result. Both parties were expecting aid from without the city, and upon that the event seems likely to depend. If we can judge anything from the apparent unanimity throughout the country in favour of the Democratic Constitution and policy as against the assumed dictatorship of Comonfort, that side would seem likely to receive the greatest accession of strength and to carry the day. Juarrez, the Chief Justice, the leader of the Puros party, and under the Constitution the successor of Comonfort in case he should resign or be removed, has been released from the confinement in which Comonfort had placed him, and seems to be co-operating with that General against the Santa Anna party. According to some accounts a new Government has been arranged, at the head of which he has been placed.

The result of the present struggle will probably be the total abandonment of the temporizing policy which has characterized the government of Comonfort. Should the party which has pronounced in favour of Santa Anna succeed in carrying the day, we expect to see all the late attempted reforms utterly thrown aside, and a return to all the old abuses. On the other hand, should the Puros triumph, which seems on the whole most likely, the secularization of the church property will probably proceed at an accelerated pace.

The Recent Chloroform Case.

To the Editor of the Globe.

SIR,—You will oblige me by giving early insertion to the accompanying communication, which I this morning received from Dr. Bovell, as the information it contains is no doubt anxiously desired by the community.

I am, sir,
Yours truly,
JAMES H. RICHARDSON.
Bay-street, Feb. 5, 1858.

ST. GEORGE'S SQUARE,
TORONTO, Feb. 5, 1858.

MY DEAR RICHARDSON,—

In answer to yours, I am enabled to state that I made a post mortem examination of the body of the late Mr. McChesney at the request of Dr. Grant; the particulars of which I have much satisfaction in furnishing.

The body was that of a man of spare habit, and from the expression of the face and the colour of the skin, had evidently suffered from impaired digestion—the rigor mortis was not well established. The chest being opened, the lungs were found to be large, and fully occupied the cavity of the thorax, were of a greyish-pink colour, containing a large quantity of air, and the surface modulated in consequence of dilation of the air cells; giving rise to general emphysema—this state was, as usual, very well developed along the margin of the lobes. Posteriorly they were very slightly congested. The right lungs adhered closely to the walls of the chest, and the lobes adhered to each other. The bronchial tubes of the first, second and third generation were extremely rigid, in consequence of their undergoing calcareous hardening, and the muscular bands between the rings were remarkably hypertrophied. There was not a single tubercular nodule or grain to be felt or seen. The heart externally was fat and very flaccid, and as a whole was not very large. On closer inspection it was found that the structure had undergone changes. On cutting into the left heart, its structure was firm enough, and the walls were evidently undergoing concentric hypertrophy; the cavity contained no great quantity of blood; the valves were healthy, and closed the auriculo-ventricular opening well. On the right side, a different condition of things existed. The ventricle and auricle were both enlarged, and the former cavity especially, while the walls were much thinned, and presented a pale yellowish colour. The tricuspid valve was not efficient, and permitting free regurgitation.—The valves were themselves perfectly smooth, and offered a clean edge to the current of blood. The liver was large."

Such is the short history of the appearances found, and after giving every consideration to the case, I cannot understand how any blame can attach to you. It is certainly a most unpleasant and sad thing to see a fellow-creature sink into death while administering to him that which was intended to be for relief, but it must be recollected that even under the most advantageous circumstances, and under the most skilful hands, untoward results have followed the use of agents much less potent than chloroform; and further, that in many instances, it is a matter of certainty that the death was not caused by the agent last employed or rather used at the moment. I am not prepared to say that chloroform should be withheld in cases such as that now under review. I have often employed it for the relief of asthma when I knew the heart to be affected to a considerable extent; and in the two cases in which I witnessed injurious effects following inhalation, there was no disease of the heart, lungs, or brain.*—Common observation teaches us that some persons are especially susceptible of the intoxicating and poisonous effects of spirituous drinks, or of opium, so is it with chloroform; and I have no doubt but that a careful analysis of the cases on record, would prove that the deaths from chloroform bear the same ratio now that they did when the agent was first introduced, and that there must always be some risk attendant on its administration. Permit me to direct your attention to the condition of the heart in Mr. McChesney's case. The right cellar walls were thinned and the organ very weak, and permanent patency of the valves existed. I believe that it would have been very difficult to have defined during life the exact nature of the lesion here, and I presume that I am right in this conjecture, since three qualified medical men examined him in different illnesses without discerning this state. The left side only undergoing slight thickening, there was not any serious mischief on that side. With a heart in such a condition, what effort would syncope have on the person, induced only by the pain or dread of an operation, and without the employment of an anæsthetic agent?

I was in the habit of administering chloroform to a lady who had considerable dilatation of the heart and lungs—a confirmed asthmatic. The last occasion on which it was administered, she was sitting at an open window, suffering very distressingly from laborious respiration; chloroform as usual was placed upon a towel, and held for inspiration; shortly the breathing became more tranquil, but suddenly the eyes became fixed, and the lips pale. Instantly dashing the face with cold water, forced, deep sighing was caused, and most fortunately all was well again after a little time. About two months after, another attack of her old complaint, in less than five minutes terminated life; no chloroform was used.

A gentleman dislocated his clavicle; he was placed in a chair, and reduction attempted; feeling faint, he told the practitioner, Dr. Deazley, not to mind that but to go on; in a moment the eyes became fixed, the pulse ceased to beat, and it was only by the employment of strong ammonia, which happened to be in the room, that revival was brought about; no chloroform had been used.

To return to this case, it cannot be said that the extraction of the teeth was a simple operation, and even if you had known that poor Mr. McChesney had heart affection, the question would have been, had he better run the risk of a shock to the system with out inhalation, or avert the shock by encountering the lesser danger from chloroform, especially where it was not carried to the stage of somnolency. Mr. McC. was sensible enough to do as he was bid, and spat into the basin; it is clear, therefore, that he was not deeply under its influence.

Since making the post mortem I have examined the evidence as taken before the coroner, and so far from blame attaching, it seems perfectly clear that every possible precaution was taken to prevent mischief. If, therefore, death resulted in this instance from chloroform, most certainly the operators are not to be held responsible.

With sincere regards, believe me, my Dear Richardson,

Yours,
W. BOVELL.

EFFECT ON THE ESCORT.

The following additional particulars relative to the escort of Lancers of the Imperial Guard who accompanied the Emperor to the Opera on the night of the 14th . on a semi-official source:—The first explosion took place the moment that the Im a. carriage was passing, at a moderate pace the central door of the grand entrance to the Opera. It put out the gas lights—the men and horses had been dazzled by the brilliancy of the illuminations—they were now enveloped in total darkness. The horses that were advancing by four after the carriage, terrified by the report, by the sudden darkness, and particularly by the first projectiles with which they were hit bounded forward, to the right and left of the Emperor's carriage, so as completely to encircle it. While doing this the second explosion took place. Out of 28, 12 men and 24 horses were wounded—some in several places, and almost all the men had their clothes and helmets cut through. The third explosion took place under similar circumstances. Several who were eye-witnesses of the affair are of opinion that the Emperor and Empress owe their safety chiefly to the troops having formed a rampart round them. The two men who preceded the carriage were saved from injury. The two in the rear were likewise unhurt. The officer who rode at the door on the right of the carriage, with the trumpeter behind him, was wounded in the leg, his horse having plunged forward at the second explosion, and carried him under the passage leading to the Rue Rossini, where the staircase set apart for the Emperor begins. There he found six men whose horses had also carried them forward. He brought back these men to the carriage, except two whose horses had fallen wounded. The sergeant who rode by the door on the left side of the carriage received three wounds, and the breast of his horse was laid open by a formidable projectile, which, from the direction it was taking, would have reached the Emperor's carriage had it not been intercepted. The escort was placed in line so as to cover the carriage, from which the Emperor and Empress alighted in safety. Except the four already mentioned as at some distance there is not a man of the escort whose clothes, helmet, and equipments do not bear traces of the explosions. The epaulet of the officer who is not wounded was cut through, his coat torn, and the brass mounting of his cartridge box broken to pieces.

THE PROJECTILES.

The Dront gives the following particulars:—"The bombs were of cast-iron, oblong, and in the form of a pear, and in the widest part from four to five inches in diameter. The shock of one of the caps, of which each had several, on a hard substance necessarily caused an explosion. The bombs were loaded with detonating powder. The first thrown at the carriage of the Emperor was just after the vehicle entered the Rue Lepelletier; it did not touch the Emperor nor even the vehicle, but it wounded about twenty persons. On this the coachman whipped up his horses, but almost immediately a second bomb burst, and one of the horses being struck by three projectiles fell to the ground. A third bomb, thrown with more precision, fell beneath the carriage itself, and burst with tremendous force, smashing part of it in pieces. The splinters of this bomb wounded the second horse, which expired some minutes after. The coachman, named Ledoux, was wounded in the hand. The only person in the carriage with the Emperor and Empress was Gen. Roguet, and he, as already stated, received a slight injury. The escape of their Majesties was quite miraculous. The Emperor received a slight cut on the side of his nose by a piece of glass from the carriage window. Another piece of glass struck the Empress at the corner of the left eye but left no traces. Superintendent Herbert, of the police, who opened the door of the Emperor's carriage at the moment of the third explosion, was dangerously wounded. The carriage itself was yesterday taken into the court-yard of the Tuileries, and visited by great numbers of persons.—All the under-part and front of the carriage had the appearance of being blown to pieces.

ARRESTS.

Five minutes previous to the explosions Mr. Hebert, a peace officer, recognized at the corner of the Rue Lepelletier an Italian named Pierri, who had lately returned to Paris, and who had been expelled from France in the year 1852. Pierri travelled with a false passport, which he had obtained in London, and entered France through Belgium. Although he spoke English, and was disguised, M. Hebert, who had not seen him for five years, recognized and arrested him. Pierri was the bearer of a six-barrelled revolver and a bomb similar to those exploded, together with a long dagger. After having lodged Pierri in the guard house, M. Hebert was in time to open the door of the Emperor's carriage, when he received two severe wounds.—Among the first persons arrested are four foreigners. Three of them were arrested in a furnished hotel in the Rue Montmartre, and one in the Rue Lapelletier. It is said that the projectiles were thrown from the first floor of that hotel. The number of arrests is increasing every moment. Some police stations are overcrowded with prisoners. Shortly after the explosions, a priest, who was passing in the Rue Lepelletier, afforded spiritual aid to the wounded who required it.

The persons arrested are all in Mazas prison. They are in a much better position in life than the Pianoris and Tibaldis were. Some of them are well-known persons of good family. They were all well dressed, and had plenty of money about them. Several Frenchmen, as well as Italians, are in custody.

Very shortly after the commission of the crime an Italian, named Count Orsini, was arrested in his lodgings in the Rue Monthabor. He confessed that he had been in the Rue Lepelletier, and had thrown one of the shells. Whether he threw it from the street or from the window of a furnished lodging house opposite, which seems most probable, is not quite clear. He was himself wounded by the explosion. A sum of £300 to £400 in English gold and bank notes was found in his lodgings. Orsini was found out in consequence of an accomplice, who, by the state of excitement in which he was attracted the attention of the police. On being arrested, he gave Orsini's address, but called him by an English name. Some say, however, that his passport bore the Portuguese name of Jose da Silva.

The person named Orsini is, it appears, the same whose extraordinary escape from the prison of Mantua, as recounted in the papers about a year ago, excited so much curiosity. He had been condemned to death by the Austrian tribunals. He had taken a very active part in the Italian revolution in 1848. During the Manzini insurrection at Rome, Orsini was sent, as commissioner to Ancona to inquire into the assassinations which were of frequent, and even daily, occurrence there. He had been mixed up in various attempts at insurrection since the fall of the Roman Republic. After the explosion of the projectiles he made his way to his lodgings in the Rue Monthabar, and it was owing to the inquiries of his servant at the guard house of the Rue Lepellettier, who, with agony depicted in his countenance, demanded of the bystanders where his master was, that he was apprehended.

When Pierri was taken to the guard house the explosion had not yet taken place; in two minutes, however, it reached his ear. He cried out to the guard, "Do what you like with me, I am content; the blow is struck." He appeared certain that it had taken effect, but was dismayed when he heard of the Emperor's escape.

The Paris correspondent of the Morning Herald states that no fewer than 232 persons have been arrested on the charge of being implicated in the plot of the 14th.

ORIGIN OF THE PLOT.

The Moniteur publishes the following article:—

"The crime at which all Paris still shudders, and which will excite the indignation of the whole world, appears to be the result of a vast plot concocted in other countries. In fact the Government received from Jersey, so long ago as June last, the following information: "The plot consists in the manufacture of fulminating grenades, invented by ——. They are of a power hitherto unknown, and are intended to be thrown underneath the carriage, where their striking against the pavement will cause their explosion and the destruction of the carriage." On the other hand, a fresh manifesto of Mazzini appeared on the 9th inst., in the Italia del Popolo of Genoa. Lastly, the reports recently received from London by the French government stated as follows:—"A man named Pierri, who is a native of Florence, and formerly an officer in the Italian Legion, has just quitted England for the purpose of carrying into execution a plot concocted against the life of the Emperor. This Italian is a man of from 40 to 45 years of age, small in stature, thin, dark, and of a sickly hue. He speaks French badly, with a strong Italian accent, but speaks English very well. He is a violent, sanguinary, and very determined man, who was obliged to fly from his own country in consequence of several murders, and among others that of a priest. Before leaving England, Pierri had several interviews with the French refugees in London." A later account says:—"Pierri has passed through Brussels, where he saw several refugees. He has proceeded to Paris by way of Lille, accompanied by an elderly man whom he took up at Brussels, and carrying with him a machine of hollow cast iron, made on the Jaquin system. It is remarked this man travels in first class carriages, alights at the first hotels, and appears to be well supplied with money." This same Pierri, whose description was in the hands of the Police agents of Paris, was arrested on the evening of the attempt near the Opera a few minutes before it took place. Unfortunately, his accomplices were already at work, and it was not possible to prevent their guilty design."

LATER PARTICULARS.

A bill is about to be presented to the Corps Legislatif for granting pensions to the victims of the attack at the Opera on Thursday night, and to their families.

The projectiles used to assassinate the Emperor have been examined by a commission composed of artillery officers. It ... that they were charged with fulminating mercury. They each produce from 70 to 75 explosions. It may easily be imagined what destruction they might occasion.

The Globe's Paris correspondent says:—"All the interest centres in Count Orsini, who appears as the Guy Faux of the conspiracy. His opinions on political matters have never been a secret, and when ill legated by the Roman triumvirs to Ancona to suppress assassination, he went so vigorously to work that the stiletto disappeared in the legations. His capture by the Austrians, and his escape from the citadel of Mantua have been read in pamphlets, letters and the Daily News. It was of late his stock in trade. He looked on Mazzini as too hesitating a tactician to suit his views; and it may be relied on that Orsini never had any intercourse with the Genoese ringleader. In personal appearance he is far more formidable than that sad Werter-faced looking man," his aspect betraying energy and violence. As to DeSilva, the Venetian, whose real name is Rudio, he lived here in fashionable style in the Rue des Pyramides, and sported a curricle.—One of the gang lived in the Rue Fellctie, three others in Rue Montmartre, and they visited each other daily. Since the 8th of January, when they arrived from London, the police had an eye on them all, and it is not preposterous to attribute to England any hand in an act which was concoted in the heart of Paris, where Orsini had been these three weeks, living opposite the treasury, next the greatest thoroughfare in town."

The Daily News' correspondent says that Orsini is so seriously injured by the explosion of the grenade which he threw that he is not considered likely to live. When he was asked his name, at the time of his examination by the magistrate, he said, "What matters? Our name is Legion."

The Paris correspondent of the Times, in a letter dated Tuesday, the 19th, says: "There are now more than eight Italians in custody; the examinations are going on, but still with much secrecy, and anything that may be said of the nature of the disclosures, if disclosures they may be, must necessarily be conjectured. If Pieri, Orsini, and the others have made an avowal of their guilt, as has been stated, it will of course greatly abridge the proceedings; if not, the evidence against them will require more time to sift it. I am not aware of any new facts with reference to the prisoners."

The Paris correspondent of the Morning Post, written on the 19th, says:—Slowly but surely evidence is falling into the hands of the French police that the late attempt on the Emperor's life was to have been accompanied by revolutionary movements in France and Italy. The police continue to hear of new cases of the wounded. The number now reaches 141 known to have been injured by the explosions. Orsini is reported to-day dangerously ill. I believe it will be found that all the four Italians concerned have confessed their guilt. They have been interrogated again to-day, but I am unable to give the result."

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News, writing on the evening of the 19th, says:—"It appears that on the day of the crime Orsini had made preparations for departure, and was to have left Paris the next day for Italy. It is known that a bomb, similar to that seized on Pieri, and a pistol was picked up near the Opera, where no doubt they were deposited by one of the assassins. The gunsmith who sold the pistol has been discovered, and he has, it is said, recognized one of the Italians in custody as the purchaser. Two other bombs, but not yet charged with fulminating ... [illegible] ... by Orsini in his apartments, and ... [illegible] ... Orsini's ... [illegible] ... mercury, have been found at the residence of the persons arrested. Four of the persons arrested wore around the neck loose scarfs of the same pattern and colour, and it is supposed that they do so as a rallying sign."

From the Birmingham papers we learn that there is good reason for believing that the plot to assassinate the Emperor of the French was concocted in Birmingham, by Pieri (who has been for four years residing there as a teacher of languages), and Felice Orsini, who recently paid a secret visit to his friend in that town.

The following is an extract from a private Paris letter received in Manchester:—The following account of the explosion of the infernal machine is from an eye-witness.—"I was walking," said this gentleman, "down the Rue Lepelletier towards the Boulevard, with my child, a little girl, holding my hand. Opposite the door of the Opera, a small crowd had collected, waiting to witness the arrival of the Emperor and Empress. Ristori, it had been announced, was to play 'Marie Stuart.' The imperial carriage soon drove up attended by an escort of Lancers. While the Emperor and Empress were descending from their carriage, a man in a blue blouse, who had been standing by the side of my child, advanced suddenly and threw something about eighteen inches long and five broad under the carriage. Three explosions went off successively, and a horrid uproar ensued, amidst which the Emperor and Empress ran into the theatre. Confusion and horror paralysed everybody for some seconds, upon awakening from which I saw the carriage broken, two horses killed, a young lady apparently dead, a guard with his leg broken, and several lookers on wounded. Not merely the man in the blouse, but the bystanders who chose, had time to leave the spot before the soldiers marched up, surrounding and arresting the curious crowd which had been gathered by the reports and uproar."

The "instruction" against the prisoners charged with the murderous attempt was finished on Wednesday night, the 20th; the trial will probably come on at the beginning of next month. Several of the Frenchmen arrested have been discharged, no proof being forthcoming against them.

A secret society has been discovered in Paris in the course of the investigation, and gunpowder and arms have been seized.

A list of suspects (words of ill-omen) is in a forward state of preperation at the Home-Office; 535 names are already on it.

Pieri was found in possession of an opera ticket, and from certain signals observed in the interior of the theatre it is supposed that a number of the conspirators were among the audience. The very last time an attempt was made at a theatre, it was on a night that Ristori played; and the gathering of Italians was then, as well as on this late occasion, considered quite natural. All these matters will be sifted at the trial.

It appears from the several lists published in the Moniteur, that the whole number of persons wounded amounted to not less than 141.

Orsini, it appears (says the Pays), had resided for about six weeks at 10, Rue Monthabor. He passed himself off as an officer in the English army, and went by the name of Sir Thomas Alsopp. He had a horse on which he frequently rode in the Bois de Boulogne. Three days before the attempt, a pretended domestic, who was Gomez, came to attend him.

The four Italians, Pieri, Orsini, Gomez, and DeSilva alias Rudio, are confined in the Prison Mazas. Pieri is 50 years of age, Orsini 36, Gomez 20, and Rudio 25. Gomez is a Neapolitan and Rudio, it appears, was born in the Lombardo-Venetian Kingdom.

The Tap on the Window.

LOUIS NAPOLEON'S IDENTITY PROVED.

(From the Courier & Enquirer.)

We do not suppose that the grossly false charges made by the secret emissaries of Mazzini and his associates against the conduct and associations of Louis Napoleon whom an exile in this country, had been so effectually exposed, by authority which admits of no question, that no one will be found foolish enough to revive them. But the malignity of the wretch who seeks the life of Napoleon and through the instrumentality of Italian bravos, halts at nothing, no matter how absurdly ridiculous it may be, if there is a possibility of thereby exciting a feeling of distrust against him in France. This is most natural, and in keeping with the character and designs of such men as Mazzini, Kossuth, Ledru Rollin, and their associates. But it must excite surprise that Grotheim's Magazine should lend itself to the originating of new slanders against the Emperor, or that any other respectable press should give currency to them. Of course the Herald would naturally give circulation to any slander again Louis Napoleon; and so it would against any other living man or woman, if by so doing, it could increase the demand for its sheet, which owes its extensive circulation solely to the fact that it is known to cater with the worst passions of our nature.—But the respectable Press of the United States, will not lend itself to any such slanders as have originated in Grotheim's Magazine, which is simply a revival of the oft repeated falsehood, that Louis Napoleon when in the United States, was surrounded by a set of low associates: and with these was the habitue of the lowest and vilest resorts in the city.

At the time referred to, unfortunately for the present Emperor, his cousin was also a sojourner in our city, and it admits of no question, that he was a most dissipated and disreputable character, and openly proclaimed his profligacy.—Of course his acts were most naturally visited upon the present Emperor—but very few persons knowing, what certainly was not very probable, that there were two Prince Napoleon's residing in New York at the same time. We knew both of them; and we know, too, that while one of them, the present Emperor of France, was quietly associating with the most retired of the old Knickerbocker families of the city, and remarkably abstemious in his habits—rarely mixing in general society and never frequenting barrooms and billiard saloons—the other was a notorious rowe, and nightly frequented those places of amusement which were the habitual resort of gamblers, blacklegs and persons of similar tastes and habits. The consequence may be easily imagined. When it became known that the Prince Napoleon, who arrived in New York in 1833-37, had become the head of the French nation, of course those who had been the associates of Louis Napoleon's cousin, and who never heard of any other Prince Napoleon, very naturally imagined that their old boon companion was the fortunate man. Hence the reminiscences with which the world has been favoured of the bacchanalian follies of the present Emperor of the French in 1836-37. Never were two men more unlike than the cousins Napoleon in New York in 1836-37. The one was dignified, reserved and uncommunicative, mixing only with the oldest families and the most refined society of the city, and remarkable alike for his quiet manners and abstemious habits; while the other was a noisy, reckless prodigate roue, the habitue of drinking saloons and houses of ill-fame, and apparently utterly regardless of the decencies of life and the opinion of the world.—And now the views of the latter are attempted to be fixed upon the quiet, melancholy, retiring and invariably abstemious cousin, who, whatever his faults, was certainly white in New York as prudent and circumspect as it was possible to be. Heretofore this matter has been fully exposed; but it is revived for a purpose, and that purpose worthy only of the creatures of Mazzini.

* * * * * * * *

This matter, like all others based upon the reckless conduct of the Prince's cousin, is very easily put at rest. It is not impossible that there was such a person as Bowen, who associated and frollicked and dissipated in every conceivable way with the cousin of Louis Napoleon; but we have no reason to believe that he was known to Louis Napoleon himself. Certain it is that we, never saw or heard of him and that he did not know us. And yet, in 1839, when walking quietly down St. James Street, in London, we heard a harsh treption on a cab window, and, looking up, discovered the veritable Louis Napoleon, now Emperor of France, ... [illegible] ... by signs ... [illegible] ... and expressed himself anxious to hear from our many mutual friends in New York. He was not dead then, as we can testify; unless it was this fellow Bowen who thus imposed upon us, a stranger to him and to all the mutual friends and little reminiscences which then and subsequently constituted the subject of connection between the Prince and ourself. As it is pretended that neither of the Princes ever after returned to the United States, we incline to the opinion that what we have written is quite sufficient to expose the folly of this absurd attempt to revive the slanderous stories about Louis Napoleon's associations in this city. For, after all, this is the only, is the aim of the article in question—Its author did not expect anybody to believe the story of the Prince's death in a brothel; but his object was to assume as a conceded fact that his cousin of this disgraceful and his habits reckless[illegible] dissipate, and then use this against the Emperor in France. Most assuredly, the American press owes it to itself as well as to the cause of truth, not to give rise to this infamous canard.

MATRIMONIAL INFELICITY.—There is a curious ... [illegible] ... in progress in one of our colored churches, the facts of which we give as nearly as we can in the same words that reached our ears. Two members of the church—man and wife—are seeking a divorce, each on the ground that the husband—whatever name—(Gentlemen's names of gentlemen are simply to be given in full)—married Napoleon's cousin, and he is therefore unable to support her. She, on the contrary, declares that he resolved to take some means to rid himself of this conjugal[illegible] and become once more a man and a brother, but not a husband. There being no delinquency on hand, to which he might apply for a cup of cold water, and having a distaste for any of the more vulgar means of divorce, such as are said to be prevalent in Rochester, the exalted reasoning faculties fell back on the Fugitive Slave law as a resource. His wife was a fugitive who came here by underground railroad—he wished she had stayed underground—and so he writes to her master down South in pioneering him to come North, prove property, pay charges and take his brute back to chains and slavery. The fact leaked out, and the matter is now dividing the church. We learn that a portion of the elders think that this remanding her own wife back to slavery) was not just the fair thing, whilst others look upon it as justifiable. They argue that the husband may have offered to secretly under the bonds of wedlock, that the bonds of slavery would not be more than usually[illegible] ... ahment for the wife. Were the matter to stop there, the church is divided and disunited, but where it is to end nobody can tell.—Buffalo Commercial Advertiser.

DETAILS OF INDIAN NEWS.

General Summary.

From the Pembilly Times.

The Gwalior Contingent has been totally annihilated by the commander in chief. After their defeat on the 6th December, they were pursued by General Hope Grant, of her Majesty's 9th Lancers, who overtook them as they were crossing the Ganges, and captured 15 guns, besides immense quantities of stores. The loss on the side of the British was nominal, but Gen. Grant was slightly wounded. Our communication with Calcutta has not yet been re-opened, and the intervening districts are still partially disturbed. The Punjab and Rohilcund continue tranquil. The Governor General and governors of the minor presidencies remain at their respective seats of government. The commander in chief of Bombay has returned from Poonah, and is now at the Presidency. We have no material change to report in our money market during the past six days; the bank rates remain unaltered. Government and other securities are also without change. In the import market the holders are effecting forced sales; and business, at low rates, has been transacted to a greater extent than during the period of last report. The rates of freight continue depressed.

OUDE AND CAWNPORE.

We gave in our last summary a string of short telegraphic notices, bringing down our intelligence from Cawnpore and Oude to the 6th of December, at which date the commander in chief had defeated and scattered the Gwalior Contingent, capturing 10 of their guns. The only additional victory we have to chronicle is that of Brigadier Grant, who, on the 10th, attacked and defeated them, capturing the remainder of their artillery. We have, however, to revise and correct the summary formerly given by means of the information since received from the northwest Provinces and from Calcutta. It must be remembered, in the first place, that the contingent consists of four batteries of artillery, two regiments of cavalry, and seven regiments of infantry, all as highly disciplined as any native troops in the service; and they had not, from the time of the mutiny until their approach to Cawnpore, been weakened by defeat. They had been joined by the remnant of the Dinapore mutineers, by contingents of all the ill-disposed rajahs in this part of India, with the whole body of ruffians and bandits from the country around. In all, they probably amounted to at least 20,000 men, with above forty pieces of ordnance. On the advance of the commander in chief towards Lucknow, the force at Cawnpore, amounting to about 3,000 men, had been left in charge of General Windham. On the 24th the first detachment of the rebels crossed the Ganges, and approached Cawnpore. Gen. Windham went out to meet them on the 26th, and attacked and defeated, following them up for a couple of miles—not deeming it wise to pursue them further, lest, with such large masses in the field, the enemy might get into his rear. Having returned to Cawnpore the same evening, he encamped at Nawabgunge. The force he had gone out to meet seemed in all likelihood to entrap and draw him from his supports. The remainder of the contingent appear to have joined almost immediately after the defeat, and to have made arrangements for attack. On the evening of the 27th accordingly they poured down in overwhelming force on Windham, and compelled him to withdraw into the entrenchment. They then burned the camp, destroying three thousand tents, with our baggage and supplies. On the following day they attacked the entrenchment, but were met by a sortie from the troops, and retired under discharges of grape from our heavy guns. Our troops suffered severely, especially her Majesty's 64th Foot, Colonel Wilson, of this corps, was, however, the only officer killed. The mutineers were now able to occupy the native town of Cawnpore, when no opposition appears to have been attempted against them for several days. On the 28th Sir Colin Campbell, who had left a division at Alumbagh, under command of General Outram, reached Cawnpore with a considerable portion of the relieving force from Lucknow. Having made arrangements for sending down towards Calcutta the wounded, the sick, the women, and the children, be on the 6th attacked the enemy, and, it is said, by a feigned retreat, drew them several miles from their position. A detachment of 5,000 men had meanwhile been sent round to attack them in the rear; and so soon as time had been allowed them to take up their position, the retiring force faced round, attacked and defeated them with great slaughter. The enemy were routed and driven fourteen miles along the Calpee road. Sixteen of their guns, twenty-six battery carts and waggons, with an immense quantity of ammunition of all sorts, were captured. Our loss was insignificant. Lieut. Saltmont, A. D. C. to Gen. Grant, was the only officer who fell. The commander in chief had thus succeeded in capturing no fewer than thirty-two pieces of artillery within little more than a week. On the 9th Gen. Hope Grant, of her Majesty's 9th Lancers, who had been sent in pursuit of the enemy, overtook the fugitives at Serajgham, when they were beginning to cross their guns over the Ganges.

DESPATCH FROM SIR COLIN CAMPBELL.

The following telegram from the commander in chief to the Governor General, dated the 10th December, the latest received in Bombay, will explain subsequent operations:—

"A despatch has just been received from Gen. Hope Grant, her Majesty's 9th Lancers. It narrates that he came up with the fugitives at Serijgham, when they were beginning to cross the guns over the Ganges. He attacked them instantly with his cavalry and artillery with great spirit, and after half an hour's sharp firing, took fifteen guns, including one 18-pounder, eight 9-pounders, three 12-pounder howitzers, two 8-pounder howitzers, one 6-pounder—native—with all their stores, carts, waggons, large quantities of ammunition, bullocks, buckeries, &c. Gen. Grant estimates the loss of the enemy at about 100. He did not lose a man in the operations, he himself being slightly wounded. I congratulate your lordship on the happy finish of this particular campaign.

THE DEFEAT OF THE GWALIOR REBELS.

Sir Colin Campbell's share in the destruction of the rebels as described by a newswriter of the Maharajah Scindiah, who writes from Calpee, on the 8th December, as follows:—"Three hurkarus come straight from Cawnpore to day, and reported that the Gwalior Contingent rebels, having collected all their force and stores at Bhoti, advanced thence to a place two cos nearer to Cawnpore, and left there, with 500 or 600 men, their camp and bazaar. The whole force, including sepoys and chiefs, with their followers of all sorts, amounted to 15,000 men. Their plan was to fight with their guns up to 12 p.m., and then to assault and carry the entrenchments. At Mogul Serai, near Cawnpore, the English had a battery, and there the fight began. The rebels fought very bravely up to 2 p.m., when the English began to retire, and the rebels followed them until they were two cos from the rebel camp. Then five hundred English with two guns, advancing on the Allahabad road attacked the rebel camp, and captured it with all that was in it. Leaving a guard there they then attacked the rear of the rebels, when the retiring English turned and attacked them in front. The rebels could not endure this double attack, and fled; and the English chased them to Sachiendee, and took on the road their guns, baggage, magazine—everything. Meanwhile, the two great guns which the rebels had sent for with ammunition from Calpee, having reached Rennah, the English marched thither also and captured them. The three hurkarus who report this were in the action, and with great difficulty saved their lives, but none of their property. And of the flying sepoys no village would admit a man within their walls—not even if it were his own home. The hurkarus put up in the village of Muttabelpore, and there, at twelve o'clock at night, came Koor Dawlut Singh, but the people would not let him halt there. I cannot tell how many were slain, but shall hear to-morrow. The English fought in this battle as Roostum and Istendian alone fought before. The sahibs dismounted amid the fire of the guns, and slew the gunners with their swords, and rushing upon the gunners, stopped them as they applied the match; while the English so worked their guns, that winking is a slow operation compared to the rapidity of their fire. They fired after the fugitives as their noise directed; and if they but saw a head, that head was crushed. The blood of the dead and wounded flowed in streams."

DELHI.

When the British force moved on to Mullaghur, after the Mewatees, and the Mahomedan portions of the citizens of Delhi had escaped to Mallaghur, our force, after thrashing them, plundered all their cattle, and sent the rajah as prisoner to Delhi. On the 14th of November the Rajah of Mynpooree, having heard of the approach of a British column, retired on Calpee, where he joined the mutineers of the Gwalior contingent. On the arrival of the British force at Mynpooree, the rajah's palace was blown up by gunpowder, and we got 50,000rs in cash, and 25,000rs worth of jewelry and precious things and other property. The British then appointed Rye Benany Sing as Tehseeldar and head of that place, and our troops moved on to Cawnpore. No sooner had our force left Mynporee for Cawnpore than the Rajah Tej Sing again appeared at Mynpooree, when Benany Sing Tehseeldar retreated on Allyghur, and we are now concentrating a force at Delhi to be sent to punish the Rajah of Mynpooree. On the 17th November a European force is said to have moved on to the Kootub, where we got 30,000rs in cash, and a lot of elephants and camels, with 1,000 women of the harem of the hoary King of Delhi (the latter, what a precious prize!), all brought in to Delhi on the 27th November.

A letter from Delhi, dated December 8th, gives the following news:—

"The column for Allyghur left this on Monday last. I fancy they will return here when they have made over charge of the stores they are escorting. The actual murderer of the late Simon Fraser (a Hadjee) was caught and cut to pieces outside the city on Saturday morning last. He was caught by some villagers and tied to a tree, where he was cut to pieces."

MALWA.

Fort Mhow, Dec. 16, 1857.

A salute of 13 guns was fired in front of the flagstaff at 12.30 p.m. on the arrival in camp of Sir Robert Hamilton, Bart., agent to the Governor General for Central India; and another salute of the same number was fired ten minutes after, on the arrival of Sir Hugh Rose, K. C. B. Sir Hugh Rose has inspected the fort and the detail hospital. The Malwa field force arrived at Indore yesterday, and disarmed the cavalry portion of Holkar's troops. They are to halt there until further orders. We expect to disarm the remainder of the troops, and also to find out the chief instigators of the rebellion. I shall let you know the full particulars in my next. The dak from Bombay comes very irregularly; none today; the last date received yesterday was the 9th. Whenever the mail letters and papers are expected there is some delay or other somewhere. Some person ought to look after this, for we have no other amusement than some papers from that quarter, or letters from home.—Bombay Times.

FUTTEHPORE.

The garrison of Futtehpore, between Allahabad and Cawnpore, have been obliged to leave their entrenchments, and take up another position. Benares is also threatened by a force from Jaunpore, and a brigade was to leave on the 2nd of December, to reinforce the Jaunpore one. It is said the insurgents in the neighbourhood of Jaunpore are 20,000, and 40 guns strong, while the force round Futtehpore is about 8,000 to 10,000.

THE GHOORKAS.

We learn that a body of 9,000 Goorkhas, under the personal command of General Jung Bahadoor, passed through Seegowlee on the 2nd of December, en route to Gorruckpore, whence they proceeded to join the commander in chief. It is said they are accompanied by a large retinue of camp-followers, who are generally as good soldiers, particularly in a hand to hand fight, as the regulars themselves, being all armed with kookries.

RAJPOOTANA.

Sir Hugh Ross and Sir Robert Hamilton have been actively engaged at Indore in dealing with rebellious rajahs. They caused the Rajah Ampherra and his ministers to be arraigned for aiding the rebellion, and the court found the prisoners guilty. The ministers were hung forthwith; the rajah awaits instructions from Lord Elphinstone. This occurred at Indore on the 20th. Brigadier Stuart, in leaving Mundesor ordered the Hyderabad contingent under Major Orr, to stand fast there, and Neemuch has been reinforced by 150 of H. M.'s 83rd, under Major Prescott; 150 of the 12th Regiment of Native Infantry, two guns with Columdanze, and 30 Lancers, in charge of a good supply of ammunition and other materials of war, which are much wanted. The detachment of her Majesty's 83rd., hitherto at Neemuch, and the Lancers were to leave for Nusseerabad, where General Lawrence proposes to take speedy measures for destroying the rebels of Awah. Thence his destination will be Kotah. The rebels that were defeated at Mundesore are said to have fraternised with the Kotah mutineers, with the intention of making another attack upon Neemuch. Fugitives from the victorious army in the north are said to be collecting with the avowed purpose of going to Nusseerabad and Ajmeer.

SIR COLIN CAMPBELL'S LOSSES AT THE RELIEF OF LUCKNOW.

A supplement of the London Gazette contains Brigadier Inglis's and Sir Colin Campbell's report respecting the defence of Lucknow, and a number of Despatches relative to the operations during the siege of Delhi.

The Hurkaru has intelligence from Chittagong that the mutineers of the 34th have joined a number of vagabonds, and have taken the route to Monypore, not by the main road but by the jungles. They intend, it is supposed, to ask for assistance from the Rajah of Monypore.

Mr. Harris, the officiating commandant of the Dacca Volunteer Infantry, has written a letter to the editor of the Dacca News, explaining why he ordered the volunteers not to fire on the Pandies. From this statement we learn that the mutineers, having been disarmed were standing quietly, and that the volunteers were taking pot shots at them at eight or nine yards distance:—"When I directed the volunteers not to fire, I did so that they might not fire at men who were quietly standing so close to them, and who evinced up to that time no intention of firing. Had my orders been obeyed at once, I believe but few men could have escaped; as it was the firing only induced those to do so who were flying, and prevented none."—Madras Athenæum, Dec. 10.

Her Majesty's steamer "Vulture" arrived at Alexandria on the 10th instant, with about 200 men of the 71st Highlanders on board.

Seven batteries of guns are to be sent to India through Egypt; 20,000 Enfield rifles and other arms are also to be forwarded immediately.

Major General Inglis has been twenty-five years in the service, and served during the Canadian rebellion, and in the Punjaub campaign of 1848-9.

Profits of Tobacco.

DIFFERENCE OF NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN TRADE.

There are fifty-six manufacturers of the staple in Richmond, whose united capital amounts to four or five millions of dollars. More tobacco is raised in Virginia and opened, inspected and sold in this city, than perhaps in any one place in the United States. It is here that the choicest specimens of the weed assume the shape which commends it to the regard of devoted chewers everywhere. Tobacco is put up in as many different ways almost, as there are chewers. There is as much difference between the ideas of the Yankee and Southerner on the question of taste, as there is on any other matter. The former likes his "pig-tail" plentifully sweetened, and liquorized to a degree; the latter, the less sweetening you put in the better the tobacco. Buyers congregate here who purchase for all parts of the globe. Foreign governments are supplied by agents who reside here for that purpose. With many of our citizens the road to wealth has been via tobacco.

The Seat of Government.

COPY OF DISPATCH.

Downing Street, 31st Dec., 1857.

SIR,—By my dispatch of the 17th April last, I informed you that her Majesty had been graciously pleased to comply with the prayer of the addresses presented to her by the Legislative Council and Assembly of Canada, namely, that she would exercise the Royal prerogative by the selection of some place for the permanent Seat of Government in Canada.

This question has now been considered by her Majesty and by her Government with that attention which its great importance demanded. The statements and arrangements contained in the various memorials laid before them in consequence of your invitation to the Mayors of the several cities chiefly interested, have been fully weighed.

I am commanded by the Queen to inform you that in the judgment of her Majesty, the City of Ottawa combines more advantages than any other place in Canada for the permanent Seat of the future Government of the Province; and is selected by her Majesty accordingly.

I have, &c.,
(Signed,) H. LABOUCHERE.

Governor
The Right Hon.
Sir E. HEAD, Bt.,

The Ministry and the Opposition.

The re-election of the honourable Sidney Smith for West Northumberland, though it will not be declared until after the result of the polls is ascertained, is still so well secured by the barter on the part of some of the opposition of their political principles, in exchange for an undertaking that the Cobourg and Peterborough railway shall receive aid from the Provincial funds, that the country may receive as a moral certainty the return of Post Master General Smith. Mr. Grimshawe, the opposition candidate, from his hitherto contracted relation to provincial politics, is not expected to do more than keep a passage open, through which the attacks upon the ministry can be directed. Mr. Grimshawe is said to have the advantage of a large fortune; he will deserve the public thanks for employing it so liberally in the cause of the people. Some newspapers in the service of the Government pretend to believe that Mr. Grimshawe, is a Roman Catholic, and of a most bigotted type; we have it on the best authority that Mr. Grimshawe is a Protestant, but having married a Roman Catholic lady, he offers no obstacles in the way of her enjoyment of the religion she was educated in. Our contemporary, the Peterborough Review, tries to make capital against Mr. Grimshawe in his reference to this circumstance, building upon it that Mr. Grimshawe has ultramontane views far in advance of those ordinarily advocated by the clergy in Canada. Such arguments contrast strangely with the indignation expressed by him towards those who made such charges against his patron in this county, and they come with a bad grace too from one whose father was glad to avail himself of a Roman Catholic Seminary, wherein to warm his viper offspring into life.

In regard to the position of parties at the opening of the House, a very general feeling prevails that Mr. Macdonald will not possess strength enough to enable him to carry on the government. The question then comes to the consideration of his successor. The Ministerial portion of the press of the Province affect to sneer at the absence of organization among the members in the Opposition ranks. Any one who reads the report of Mr. Doutre's speech, delivered at Beauharnois, on the 8th inst., must admit that the Lower Canada portion of the Opposition possesses a principle of accommodation which conducts to a point at which a cordial understanding can be come to with the Opposition in Upper Canada. Upon the question of Representation they will agree to the immediate application of the principle of division according to numbers so far as the House of Assembly. Upon the question of Schools, they are content that the law shall remain as it is, and they look forward to the time when public opinion will be united so as sectarianism will no longer be a political question. With such a disposition on the part of the Lower Canada section towards the solution of these two great questions, what is to prevent the accommodation becoming mutual? The great body of the Upper Canada Opposition is content that the School law shall continue, with the additions it now has, and without doubt the safety and reasonableness of this state of things will satisfy those who took more extreme views, leaving them free to accept the proferred friendship of their valuable allies, and work out the salvation of the country, which under past administrations has been so sorely and busely neglected. The new House will meet on the 25th under the most promising auspices, and it is to be hoped the prominent men of the Opposition will know how to dispose themselves so as to produce the beneficial change in the affairs of the country which is to be looked for in a change of administration. The endorsement by the renegade electors in West Northumberland of the abnegation of principle by the Post Master General is no criterion by which to judge of the general feeling of the country. Such a price as is being paid for their homage, can be afforded in but few instances, and for the honor of the people, we may add, would be encouraged in but few constituencies.

The Theatre.

The first appearance of the Peterborough Histrionic Club was made before the public on Friday evening last, in a well filled house. The brass band, under Mr. Rackett, occupied goods. To the holders of the National Debt alone the difference between the present quotations and those which prevailed in October makes an aggregate advantage of nearly £80,000,000. The change, however, brings no accession of income, and the consequence is that each man, looking to the augmentation in the nominal total of his possessions, becomes desirous of risking a part of that augmentation in order to get a larger current return. A person who held £10,000 Consols at 86 reckoned himself worth £8,600. His property then gave him about 3½ per cent., and he might feel, moreover, that the total being all he had to depend on was so limited that he must not jeopardise any portion of it. But with the same stock at 95 he is the possessor of £9,500. He then thinks it hard that his income stands at its former point, and calculates that he will, at all events, be justified in venturing the additional £900 in some promising speculation, with the view of gaining an increase of income commensurate with his increase of capital. If he were to select any investment for which he would be required at once to pay in full no harm would accrue. That class of investments would forthwith advance in proportion to the number of such transactions; and Consols would fall in a corresponding ratio until their respective rates of interest would be so far equalized as to remove all inducements to the operation. But it is here that the gentlemen who make it their task to relieve the country of any superabundant wealth step in. If the supply of guaranteed stocks, colonial or foreign, shows the slightest indication of being restricted, owing to the demand for them on the part of sellers of Consols, these enterprising persons will immediately procure the manufacture of any quantity, and this in such a form that any one, even without selling his Consols, may obtain by some fractional payment the title to whatever amount he may desire. All that he had to do beside is simply to engage that he will meet future calls, extending over five or six years or more. In undertaking that responsibility, he of course intends to get rid of it in due time by disposing of his shares to some one else. But when the calls begin to be made, and we are sending out specie to pay foreign laborers, or shipping iron rails for which we are to get no return except in future dividends, the pressure for money once more comes on. Consols again to 86, and the coincidence is exhibited that every one had intended exactly at that time to transfer his holdings to some one else. The grinding pressure of the calls, however, shows no relaxation. The contracts have been undertaken and must be fulfilled, or the enterprise must be abandoned midway and the terms of the concession forfeited. It is here that the great evil of modern speculation, as compared with that of former days, is manifested. When foreign loans were largely contracted the money was usually wanted with some despatch; the instalments went rapidly in hard cash, and hence the consequences were felt and the evil checked before it had time to attain the proportions which are now found possible. There is, however, no remedy for it, and the folly will be repeated from time to time, and heartily joined in even by many who see with complete clearness the inevitable result, each man in the inflatuation of hope and conceit always feeling confident that he will be the one to get out at the right moment. If such persons alone suffered, perhaps there would be little to regret; but the grievance is that what might be an honorable source of constant national profit is thus altogether contaminated. It is, of course, a natural reward of English industry, frugality, and intelligence that we annually earn more than we consume. The balance thus gained would not be better employed than in assisting other countries to develope their resources and attain to our own civilization. Hence undertakings for foreign works of utility, so far from deserving to be cried down should receive within rational limits every support. In their natural course they promote good will, cause our power of usefulness to be appreciated, and diffuse endless benefits to all concerned, while carried beyond those bounds they beget the most deadly of all enmities, that of an improvident debtor towards a creditor.—Probably the best chance of a limitation of the mischief will be in the moderation of the States or Governments who may be solicited for guarantees. Such of them as may wish to maintain their financial reputation will hesitate to flood the market with engagements, each successive issue of which can only depreciate all that have gone before. With regard to India it will be the fault of the Home government if any improvidence is practised. The next danger will be from our colonies enjoying independent Parliaments, who, without much thought of their future ability, will be likely to be led by the skill of bribed orators into any extent of commitment. Bearing upon these cases, however, some experience can be cited which will possibly operate as a warning to the public. The other sources of demand will be from foreign nations. For further investments in the United States there may be no danger of an immediate mania. Among other countries, those who prize their credit such as Brazil and Sweden, who are likely to be applicants, will confine themselves to moderate amounts. Russia has spoiled her opportunities by a claim for a preposterous total, which should render her concession a drag for many years to come. Turkey is a quarter that must be looked to with caution; while with respect to France, the operations of the speculators on both sides are so blended that the prospect will simply depend upon whether a new inflation is to be promoted by the Imperial Court.—Whatever may be before us, one thing may be looked upon as certain—namely, that our funds will be scattered in any direction rather than in such as may vitally concern our immediate interests. There may be a better chance of getting ten millions for a railway from Moscow to Siberia than a tithe of that sum for a telegraph to India.

Royal Marriage.

The two occasions to which living memories will most readily revert, are the marriage of Queen Victoria herself, and the marriage of her who was to be our Queen, now more than forty years ago. That long interval can have effaced from no mind the deep interest and warm hopes with which the nation regarded the union of the Princess Charlotte with the object of her choice, and the awful shock of the event that followed. Among the princes who will be present at the approaching ceremonial, and who have already arrived at court, there is one whose strangely shadowed life forms a link between all three events. King Leopold is a singular example, not merely of the mutability of fortune, which most of us know too well, but of the restorative and remedial powers; or rather, to speak more religiously, of the Providence that may do this for us. Never was man, never was royal family, never was nation so struck down, and its high hopes so dashed to the ground, as in that instant. Never did so bright a vision so suddenly disappear in the darkness of the tomb. The nation bowed its head to a calamity felt by all—by none more than by those who did not love the King or the House. From every pulpit in the land the hand of human inability was raised from its impotence to implore a more than human succour; and there are those who date thence a softening of the heart of the people, purer morals, and a higher policy in our rulers. In a few years the prince, who had been the chief mourner, became the liberal sovereign of a new State, which he has since administered with the greatest prudence and success, and the head of the family on the management of which he may be equally congratulated. He has more than repaired what seemed an irreparable disaster, and the encouragement of his success is all the greater, because it has been attained by qualities of that unpretentious sort which are within the compass of all. We can all be moderate and prudent if we will. We can all be harmless as doves, though we may not all be wise as serpents. The people's share in the economy has been repaired in an equally striking form and abundant measure. When the sovereign died a reigning and his brother had passed away we had then another princess who filled the very place of the Princess Charlotte in the mind of the people, like her a grand daughter of George III, of almost the same age, but, it must be said, more fortunate in her choice—not a first but a second husband, and naturally on the throne. In her case a Prince Albert, and in a happy reign, of wife and princess all that the most sanguine hoped from the former marriage, and since has proved us at length where our fathers hoped to be.—London Times.

Theatrical Rehearsals Behind the Scenes.

There is nothing like seeing an undress rehearsal or taking a peep behind the scenes, for taking the romance out of a theatrical performance. The convenient presentment by gaslight is beautiful, the spectator sees lords and ladies, fairy spirits and hideous goblins, palaces and pothouses. At rehearsal all these are in their ordinary dresses, and one is entitled to form an opinion of the means used to bring out a grand theatrical display. The carelessness, swaggering tones and gait of the actors and actresses, with their morns cropped by a dirty mauve cap or tattered jacket back, are anything but suggestive of the gorgeous scene at night. The Queen of the Fairies looks very well ordering her subjects about, when surrounded by the enchanted cloud, or riding in a gas-bedizening chariot drawn by remarkable wasps. But in rehearsal the illusion is completely dispelled. The carpenter and scene painter are hammering and dashing away, the prompter is scolding the actors up to time, and everybody is trying to get their cues properly. The steam-boat moves to bear to the proper, and "Queen Mab" a tawdry female in fleshy habiliments. The fine effects are produced by the contrast means. The actors themselves who say such pretty things to blushing dancers, do not appear at all capable of any such sentiment or language. The unrestrained spectator, who had heard the scenes would, less to one, consider the whole thing an impossibility. Old stagers look complacently on all this, however. Don Mousiacherando, the gentleman who swore so beautifully the night before and insisted upon carrying Florinda to his castle, looks like and is a graduate from a cheap boarding house, and the stern father smells suspiciously of gin cocktails, while the rival lovers eyes are red with whisky sours.

How you laughed so uproariously at, is a meek looking gentleman, with a straw hat and patched coat. If, in the midst of a rapturous passage in a ballet, the music should suddenly cease, the unsophisticated spectator would be shocked to hear an explosion of expletives directed at "the awkward squad," who appeared so heavenly in his eyes, with their flesh tights, gauze skirts, and bedizened wands—a regular tinsel. The daylight lets a world of illumination upon the stage, the different characters that moved you to tears or horror, are joking and eating pea nuts, or chewing tobacco. The ladies, among them the beautiful Florinda too, are sewing up some feminine mystery. They all walk up and down the stage to get the "positions and stage business, rending their parts in a monotone, and illustrating them with very odd by play. Shakespeare was right when he declared that "All the world's a stage,

In every day life we see the play put upon the world's stage, but only occasionally witness a rehearsal, or get a peep behind the scenes. We read of brilliant achievements, of cabinet negociations, but we do not see their rehearsals. We see many domestic tragedies and comedies, and the jewells of some hidden springs and machinery but behind the curtain we cannot peep. How much then, of all that is glorious, is purely so? How much would lose its grandeur if we could [illegible] the actors as we have seen theatricals in [illegible].

Marriage in the State of New York.

From the New York Tribune.

It is laid down in the books, and the maxim is occasionally cited as bearing upon the determination of questions that come before tribunals, that the law favors marriage. Our New York statute-book—and in this respect it has been recently and, as we think unadvisedly imitated by the laws of several of the neighbouring States—carries the point a good deal further. It not only favors marriage, it favors hasty, precipitate, injudicious marriages. It does this by enabling the contract of matrimony to be made in a sudden and secret manner, and without any of that formality and notoriety which ought to attend so serious an affair, by giving to every vagabond clergyman, or pretended clergyman, authority to officiate; and in the case of minors, by depriving them of the benefit of that guardianship which it establishes for them as to all other matters.

Can anything be more absurd than that children of sixteen, and even fourteen, whom the law, on account of their inexperience and immaturity of judgment, will not allow to bind themselves for the payment of one dollar, should yet have the power of giving themselves away in marriage; and if the party be a girl, not merely herself only, but any property, whether great or small of which she may happen to be possessed? Not only does the law allow this to be done; it allows it to be done upon the suddenimpulse or artful instigation of the moment without any time for reflection or place for repentance, and under such circumstances of secrecy and haste that, even if disposed to draw back, the victim might find real difficulty in doing it. If the Legislature at Albany should ever get organized we hope that they will turn their attention, among other things, to the amendment of our marriage laws. As the contract of marriage is by our laws not dissoluble some little formality and deliberation ought certainly to be required of those who entento it.

A "King-Consort" in England.

The never seems to be wanting illustration of that old proverb which calls upon us to put up a prayer to be saved from our friends. Of all people in the world, kings, queens, and great personages generally are those who seem to have most occasion to put up such a petition. The renewed circulation of the rumored intention or wish of the Queen to give the title of King Consort to her husband at the present moment, is a strong case in illustration. It is a project which would, we think, be look upon favorably at any time.—With every respect for Prince Albert, and with every disbelief in the rumors which have attributed to him the most constant and vexatious interference in many departments of the State, and particularly in our military administration, we cannot but think that it would be highly injudicious to give him the apparent right to interfere which would be conferred by the title of "King." We say "apparent" right, for of course, in a strictly legal and constitutional sense, he would, as power and position, be exactly where he was before. The distinction would be purely titular and heraldic. But it is perfectly clear that this could not be brought home to the popular apprehension, and that the measure would look like the elevation of a stranger and an alien to a share in the British throne. It has been one of the best blessings of our political condition during the revolutionary period of the last few years that the Crown has been kept clear from political strife which has been wed below; that the feelings of loyalty which it is desirable that English men should relish to the head of the State have never been disturbed by their political divisions, or their opposition to particular statesmen. Whether this would in future be the case, if so ill advised a step were taken as that to which we have alluded, any one can judge who recollects the clamor,—unfounded, we have not the slightest doubt,—raised against the Prince in the early part of the Russian war. Our feelings of nationality and our jealousy of foreigners may be excessive, or they may not, but we think no one can doubt that in any moments of popular irritation and excitement the "King Consort's" birth would be remembered against him: and that his ostensible elevation to the regal position would inspire an amount of jealousy and distrust which would react very unfavorably upon the position of her Majesty herself. Those who are about the Court would do well—if it is not too uncourtly a thing to do—to remind her Majesty of the dead silence which prevailed, unbroken by any of the usual loyal cheers, when she went down to open that short winter session of 1854, which Lord J. Russell was obliged to commence with a formal dele ce of Prince Albert. And of a bad time could be chosen for doing a foolish thing it is the present moment. We have just received, in the matter of the Hanoverian crown jewels, a most unpleasant reminder of the time it takes to wear our German Royal importations from a paramount attachment to their fatherland. Nor have the arrangements in connexion with the Princess Royal's marriage added to the good humor of a people who now, as in the middle ages of their history, like and are willing to pay for a right Royal show, a good pageant, and a little rough out-door amusement, but who cannot be got to feel any satisfaction in knowing that certain eminent persons are enjoying themselves with dignified politeness in a continental seclusion. That the scheme has the sanction of any statesman of experience we do not believe. It is pretty notorious that the Premier's fault is not Court subservience. On the contrary, he is understood, relying on the fidelity of the British lion, to treat the Crown much as he does the Legislature. But the scheme finds favor with those underlings and parasites of the Court who are ever worst friends to Royalty. Let us hope that the sterling good sense of the Queen may be proof.—Manchester Examiner.

From the Buffalo Express of Feb. 1.

Our city was thrown into quite an excitement on Saturday afternoon by one of those affairs which indicate a sort of chivalry that is more prevalent in Mohawk than Appolonian towns. One of our citizens was raw hided in the street and in presence of numerous spectators, by a Mr. Huntington, the reputed husband of Susan Denin. The name of the sufferer we suppress on account of his family. The circumstances, as they occurred, are briefly these: The gentleman became enamored of the charms of Susan, and wrote her a note, proposing an acquaintance, which might be mutually agreeable. The following is the note in question, and it speaks for itself:

MISS SUSAN DENIN,—My dear Madam: Having long been fascinated with you, I am bold enough to ask whether, under any circumstances, you ever yield to a man's infatuation for a beautiful woman.—If ever you have done so, and can be prevailed upon to allow me the pleasure of an evening with you—not at your public entertainment, for I always possess myself of that pleasure—but where I may be alone with you, and feast my soul on "beauty unadorned," I will endeavor to make it yield, not delight it, may be to you, but an acceptible equivalent. If, in short, $25 or $30 could at all induce you to grant a stranger an interview, it will give me great pleasure to prove myself a gentleman not only capable of loving you, but of making fitting amends for your generous indulgence. Should you decide to favor me, a note stating the time and place, addressed to Chas. W. Watson, and slipped under the door of room No. 12 "Harvey's Buildings" corner of Main and Swan Streets—entrance on Swan—before the hour of 5 p. m., tomorrow—for I may not be able to get word by the Post Office before you leave—will be welcomed with infinite delight. Please do favor me if possible.

Very hastily, your ardent, &c.,
CHARLES W. WATSON.

This note, fortunately or unfortunately for the ardent writer, fell into the hands of Mr. Huntington, who felt his wife's honor and virtue insulted, and became exceedingly indignant thereat. He counselled her to accede to the terms proposed and grant the interview that had been solicited, and answered the note himself on her behalf, and in favorable language over the signature of "Sincere." The following is the response of Miss Denin's admirer:—

MY DEAR MISS DENIN,—A note responsive to mine of yesterday signed "Sincere," and penned by your own sweet self, I cannot doubt, has just come to hand. Need I tell you how very happy I am to know you have confidence enough in me to allow me to prove myself a gentleman, even in your eyes, not only as "sincere" as your self, but equally "discreet." Believe me, dear Madam, you shall have no occasion to "chide" or "scold" me, and I trust, also, no occasion to regret the indulgence you have so kindly extended to me.

When I wrote you, it was with the hope I might be able to be with you for more than a "passing hour," and I yet trust it may be my sweet privilege to do so; and if it may not be, I will endeavor to "improve the hour."

You suggest your room in the American as a place of meeting, unless I name a place more private. I should have no objection to the American, were I not so well known there to proprietors and servants—having domiciled there until quite recently.

I have in my eye a quiet, pretty place, to which it will give me pleasure to take you, and I will have things nicely arranged there for, should it be agreeable to you, and I would suggest that at the hour mentioned—5 o'clock—you step into the Reading Room of the Young Men's Association under the American Hall, where I will give you escort to the place aforesaid. If it will not be agreeable to you to adopt this arrangement, be kind enough to notify me by three P. M. by note slipped as before into No. 12 Harvey's Building, and I will then accede to any arrangement you may suggest.

Regretting to have to trouble you with so long a missive—in my proper hand this time—and sincerely hoping that nothing may come in the way of our meeting pleasantly, I remain yours very sincerely,
CHAS. W. WATSON.

Accordingly, on Saturday afternoon, Miss Denin met her new acquaintance at the place appointed, and the two repaired to the corner of Main and Eagle Streets, where they took a seat in a buggy and drove off. Huntington, it appears, had a body of friends in waiting to observe the movements of Susan and her companion. Among those who were with Huntington, was Mr. Kent of the Theatre, the gentleman who, if we recollect rightly, was rawhided in the streets of Cleveland by Miss Denin a few years since. The buggy with Miss Denin and her friend passed down street, and Mr. Huntington and his friends followed in a carriage. They proceeded to a house on Carroll Street, near Michigan, where Miss Denin's friend handed her down, and Huntington joined them. Susan introduced him to the gentleman as her husband, saying that they could then settle the matter in their own way. Mr. Huntington then struck the individual several blows on the head and shoulder with a whip, when they closed and fell, and rose again, and then went down again when the assailed broke away from Huntington and ran off, leaving his horse and buggy and a sword cane which Huntington has in his possession, and upon which is inscribed the name of a citizen of unsullied reputation heretofore. Thus ended the affair.

Now we are at a loss to account for the course pursued by Mr. Huntington and Miss Denin in this matter. If their purpose was to correct the morals of Buffalo, they were engaged in a good work. If they were in pursuit of notoriety, they have succeeded in attaining it. Few husbands and wives would have pursued the course of these people under similar circumstances. If the first note had been unanswered that would have been the end of it. Miss Denin's reputation would not have suffered—her husband might have been saved the disgrace of making a public exhibition of himself, and the silly citizen who was caught in the meshes of the web that had been woven for him by these people, might have been saved the mortification and disgrace that follows the affair. In our opinion it is alike disgraceful to all parties involved. If our memory serves us right, this is not the first time that Mr. Huntington has been a participator in a similar affair. Some years since, while sojourning here a few years since, with a band of Negro Minstrels assaulted a waiter at the Western Hotel with a knife, and came near cutting his throat, and at a previous visit to this city, stabbed a negro. That, it would seem, should give him notoriety enough here without this last act.

Detailed Account of the Keitt and Grow Fight.

(From the N. Y. Times Correspondent.)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6, 1858.

The telegraph has already given you a general statement of the fact that we had a grand row in the House of Representatives at about four o'clock this morning, but some additional particulars may be found of interest. The Anti-Lecompton men yesterday determined to have a vote at once upon the proposition of Mr. Harris to refer the constitution of Kansas to a Select Committee, with instructions to investigate the frauds alleged to have been committed in connection with the formation of that instrument and the elections held under it.—The Lecomptonites, upon counting noses, found themselves decidedly in the minority, and so determined to stave off the vote until they should have had time to consult, and, if possible, effect changes enough to save defeat. So they began the game of factious opposition, resorting to calls of yeas and nays on motions to adjourn, calls of the house, &c., &c. This they kept up from three o'clock yesterday afternoon until six this morning, the Anti-Lecompton men pressing steadily for a vote on the previous question, and expressing their determination never to yield it. The Douglas Democrats were as firm and unyielding in the contest as the most faithful of the Republican leaders, and deserve all praise for their conduct.

Everything passed off, however, in excellent temper, and with less excitement than is usual to night sessions, until nearly 4 o'clock this morning. Mr. Grow, who is the recognized Republican leader in the House, went over to the Democratic side of the Hall to talk with Mr. Hickman, of Pennsylvania. As he turned to leave, Mr. Quitman rose and asked to make an explanation. Mr. Grow objected to any speeches which were out of order, and then started down the aisle, with a view of returning to his own seat, when Mr. Keitt, of South Carolina, called out to him, asking, "Why don't you go over on your own side, God d—n you, if you want to object? What business have you over on this side, any how I" or something to that effect.

Mr. Grow replied quietly and coolly, saying, "This is a free hall, and I have the right to object from any part of it when I choose." Then, in response to an appeal from Mr. Harris, of Indiana, Mr. Grow withdrew his objection, in order to permit Gen. Quitman to go on. By this time, Keitt, who seems to have supposed that he had only to look at a Northern man to wilt him—and who presumed, perhaps, upon the fact that he is a more athletic man than the gentleman from Pennsylvania—had crossed over to meet Mr. Grow. As the latter was about to pass, Keitt inquired in a rufflanly tone "What did you mean by that answer which you gave me just now?"

"I meant precisely what I said—that this is a free hall, and I will object from whatever part of it I see fit," was Mr. Grow's reply, as he looked his assailant calmly in the face. The chivalrous and gentlemanly South Carolinian returned to the charge, saying: "I'll show you, you d—d Black Republican puppy!" Mr. Grow, still unexcited, answered, "You may think me what you please, Mr. Keitt, but let me tell you that no nigger-driver shall come up from his plantation to crack his lash about my ears!" "We'll see about that," said Keitt; as he caught Mr. Grow by the throat. Mr. G. threw his assailants hand off, and Mr. Reuben Davis, also of Mississippi, who had followed Mr. Keitt, evidently with the intention of restraining him, interposed at once for peace.

This ended the difficulty for an instant, but almost immediately Keitt broke from Mr. Davis and rushed upon Grow, seizing him again by the throat, when the latter planted a blow under the left ear of "the gentleman from South Carolina," which sprawled him fairly upon his face on the floor. Mr. K. picked himself up and after some ineffectual and random passes, left the hall, and was seen no more until after the melee ended, except by some friends who sponged his bruises. I understand that he is under the impression that he stubbed his toe and so fell! The mistake, certainly, is excusable, for the blow which he finally provoked from Mr. Grow's long-suffering patience, was so severe that he could hardly be expected to have any very clear recollection of the circumstances.

These transactions, which take so much time to relate, were the work of a very few minutes, and all occured on the Democratic side of the house. When the blow was struck, a dozen Southern men rushed towards the parties, some doubtless to keep the peace, and others to have a hand in the fight. Barksdale, of Mississippi, McQueen of South Carolina, Craige of North Carolina, and Reuben Davis were prominent in the scrimmage. Barksdale specifically states, and I doubt not truly, that his only object was to separate the contestants.—He and other opponents seized upon Grow at once, as Keitt was already hors de combat. To gentlemen on the other side of the hall, it looked very much as though the gentleman from Pennsylvania was about to be cut into mince-meat, and the Anti-Lecompton men rushed over in a body to the rescue. Foremost came Mr. Potter, of Wisconsin, a very athletic, compact man, who bounded into the centre of the excited group, striking right and left with tremendous vigour. Washburne, of Illinois, and his brother, of Wisconsin, also were prominent, and for a minute or two it seemed as though we were to have a Kilkeny fight on a magnificent scale. Barksdale had hold of Grow, when Potter struck him a severe blow, supposing that he was hurting that gentleman. Barksdale turning around and supposing it was Elihu Washburne who struck him dropped Grow, and struck out at the gentleman from Illinois. Cadwallader Washburne perceiving the attack upon his brother, also made a dash at Mr. Barksdale, and seized him by the hair apparently for the purpose of drawing him "into chancery" and pummeling him to greater satisfaction. Horrible to relate, Mr. Barksdale's wig came off in Cadwallader's left hand—and his right fist expended itself with tremendous force against the unresisting air. This ludicrous incident unquestionably did much towards restoring good nature subsequently,—and its effect was heightened not a little by the fact that in the excitement of the occasion Barksdale restored his wig wrong side foremost.

There seemed to be very little method in the struggle, and it was hard to tell who were in for earnest, and who were trying to restore order. The Speaker yelled and rapped for order, without effect. The Sergeant-at-arms stalked to the scene of battle, mace in hand, but his "American eagle" had no more effect than the Speaker's gavel. Owen, Lovejoy and Lamar, of Mississippi, were pawing each other at one point—each probably trying to persuade the other to be still. Mr. Mott, the gray-haired Quaker representative from Ohio, was seen going here and there in the crowd. Davis, of Mississippi, got a severe but accidental blow from Mr. Grow, and various gentlemen received slight bruises and scratches. A Virginian representative, who thought Montgomery, of Pennsylvania, was about to "pitch in," laid his hand upon his arm to restrain him, and was peremptorily ordered to desist or get knocked down. Mr. Covode, of Pennsylvania, caught up a heavy stone-ware spittoon, with which to "brain" whoever might seem to deserve it, but fortunately did not succeed in getting far enough into the excited crowd to find an appropriate subject for his vengeance; and all over the Hall everybody was excited for the time.

Fortunately it did not last long, and no weapons were openly displayed. When order was restored, several gentlemen were found to present an excessively tumbled and disordered appearance, but there remained little else to recall the excitement. Gentlemen of opposite parties crossed over to each other to explain their pacific dispositions, and that they got into a fight when their only purpose was to prevent a fight. Mutual explanations, and a hearty laugh at the ludicrous points of the drama, were followed by quiet and a return to business. Disgraceful though all such scenes are, it must be admitted that Mr. Grow was in no degree responsible for this. He was brutally assailed, and defended himself at least only after forbearance had ceased to be a virtue. If the lesson which he impressed upon his assailant shall have the effect of restraining henceforth Mr. Keitt's exhibitions of insolence, and his offensive affectations of superiority over his equals, I don't know that the result will have been too dearly purchased. He seems to have laboured for years under the impression that a man who don't own negroes can be trodden upon with impunity, and it is to be hoped that his present discomfiture will inspire him with that respect for his colleagues which is their due.

Lola Montez in the Witness Box

Lola Montez was called as a witness in the New York Supreme Court on Wednesday, in a case before a referee to impeach the character of David Jobson, whose assignee was the plaintiff. She gave her evidence with a good deal of unction. The following was her cross-examination by Mr. Schermerhorn:

My name is Lola Montez; my family name was Maria Rosanna Gilbert. Q.—Where were you born? A.—In the beautiful town of Limerick. Q.—How old are you? A.—Thirty-three. Q.—When were you born? A.—Count; I cannot tell; I wasn't present when I was born; I have had two husbands, and I am on the point of having a third; my first husband was Captain James. Q.—Were you married to Captain James? A.—The ring was put on my finger by a clergyman, but my spirit was never united to him. Q.—What other husband have you had? A.—Now, wait a moment; I'd never have you, be sure; I was married to James near Dublin; I was a child of fifteen; he ran away with me; that was my first marriage; he ran away with another lady about a year after I was married; I was living in Mugeer, India, then; I lived there about seven years; from there I came to England, I think in 1842; I married about the year 1845; I don't know how long I remained in London after I returned; a few months; I was on the stage and practising under the instruction of a Spaniard named Espa; I was lodging with an old Scotchman and his wife; my father was Adjutant-General of the Bengal army. Q.—Were you living with a man at that time? A.—I never lived with any man since my husband left me; my husband charged me with an intrigue with a man named Captain Lenox, on shipboard, but it was a false accusation made by him, because he was living then with Mrs. Captain Lomar, of the 21st Regiment; I went from London to Spain, and all over that country; I remained in Spain a few months learning to dance; I was travelling perfectly alone as I travel now; there was a charming little girl named Dolores in Spain, whose husband had deserted her. Q.—For you? A.—I never did anything of that sort of thing. Q.—How many intrigues have you had?—A.—How many have you? Well, come listen—None; I resided at the Court of Bavaria two years. Q.—Who did you know there? A.—Everybody but yourself; I knew all about several millions of persons; I knew the King of Bavaria, Mr. Wittelsbacher, he was called—that was his family name. Q.—Were you the mistress of the King? A.—(Rising) What! (emphatically) No, Sir! You are a villain, Sir; I'll take my oath on that book. (the Bible,) which I read every night, I had no intrigues with the old man; I knew the King, and moulded the King to the love of Freedom; he took me before the whole Court with his wife, and presented me as his best friend; I was on the stage at Bavaria; it is easier to be a man's mistress than a dancer; I was in Bavaria in 1847 and 1848; in 1849, the Revolution occurred, and Liberty and I fled; the King and Queen supported me while I was there; I was engaged in political business; you might call me prime-minister if you please, or as the King said, I was the king; there was a man of straw there as prime-minister: true, but he was only a man of straw; the memoirs that have been written about me are lies; that man is trying to get my memoirs I suppose; (Mr. Jobson was writing;) I was living in Piccadilly, London, in 1849, when I saw Jobson; I had come from Switzerland about two months before; and I was in India when very young; I was three months old when I sailed for India the first time. Q.—Did you call on Mr. Jobson first, before he called on you? A.—(starting up)—No, no: (laughing aloud,) oh, that is too funny. I was called Countess of Landsfeldt and not Mrs. James. Q.—Didn't Mr. Jobson subscribe a guinea to prevent you from being taken to the watch-house? A.—He hadn't a guinea. Q.—Did not he give you a guinea to keep you from taking to the streets for a livelihood?

Witness—(Indignantly rising)—Am I to be insulted? Gentlemen, will you not protect me?

The referee quieted her.

Referee—Mr. Schermerhorn should not have asked the question.

Witness—Schermerhorn? Is that his name? Oh, ho! I shall have some questions to ask him. (She wrote down the name of plaintiff's counsel.)

At this point, a little before 6 o'clock, the reference was adjourned.

A MORMON WOMAN'S INFATUATION.—A gentleman residing in this city, with his wife and family, had occasion some months ago to go up the country, leaving his wife in possession of nearly all his worldly gear. Upon his return, he was surprised that she had left for the Mormon settlement at St. Bernardino, carrying everything with her. He started in pursuit by the next steamer, and found his wife and family at San Bernardino with a team, all packed up for Salt Lake. He tried to persuade her to remain but it was useless. She threw herself upon his neck and wept fervently because he would not go with her; but she refused to turn back. She appeared to feel very badly at the idea of leaving her husband among the Gentiles, who, she believed, were destined to be destroyed by wars, famine and pestilence, and told him he would yet be glad to walk to Salt Lake and beg for bread, as the whole Gentile race were doomed. She told him he would be starving here; but in the land of Saints there would be abundance of the world's goods. The husband, rather than go on with her, turned back and left her in the company of those who had succeeded in imbuing her mind with such a strange infatuation. He now hopes to go on to the Lake in the Spring with the troops, rescue her and her family and send her back to her parents.—San Francisco Chronicle, Dec. 28.

The Canada Directory.

We learn from our city contemporaries that Mr. John Lovell—the spirited and enterprising publisher of this great work—having obtained the necessary permission to that effect from the Imperial authorities, intends transmitting a copy of the Directory to her Majesty the Queen. This has been got up in a style worthy of being presented to royalty, and such as will display to most advantage the character of such a portion of Canadian industry, and the perfection to which it has been brought. The volume is represented to be elegantly bound in Morocco, richly gilt, with tinted pages of rich white satin. It is accompanied by Keefer's Map of Canada, stretched on a sheet of white satin, and enclosed in a handsome morocco case, bearing on the inside leaf, as does the Directory also, the royal arms. The type is Canadian, from the foundry of Mr. Palsgrave; the paper is from the manufactory of Messrs. Bonnin & Co., and the binding and printing has been done in the city. While the contents of the volume, therefore, will give her Majesty some idea of the vast extent of this Province—rightly designated the brightest jewel in the imperial diadem—its immense resources; the degree to which they have been opened up and developed; and our progress in the arts and manufactures—the mere material labor which has been spent in collecting the necessary information to make up such a work, and in ornamenting and decorating the copy which is to grace the royal library, will enable her to form a fair estimate of the energy, the enterprise, and the ability which we think, without being guilty of undue laudation, we may say is a noted feature in the character of her loyal Canadian subjects. That the Directory will be regarded by the Queen with much curiosity, and looked at with some surprise, there is every reason to believe. For there are but few in England whose conceptions of this Province—its population and the intelligence of its inhabitants—the richness and fertility of its soil—the immense field of usefulness and competence which it offers to the emigrant—the extent and variety of its commerce—are by any means so enlarged as they ought to be—as they certainly will be by an intimate perusal of this interesting and most complete and useful repertory of Canadian information. The extraordinary accuracy and reliability of the details are two of its great recommendations. Gathered from every nook and corner of the Province—in the most populous cities and in the obscurest and most sparsely peopled hamlets, we leave the assurance of a confrere who has had occasion since its publication almost daily and hourly to refer to it, that he has not yet detected a single inaccuracy, or hit upon a single error. In former articles we have adverted to the enormous expense of the publication, and the heavy risk the publisher had to run before offering such a book for sale. At the time it was undertaken, the commercial world was in the full swing-tide of prosperity and wealth; before its completion the ebb had set in, and millionaires had become beggars. It could scarcely be expected that the monetary pressure which, though to a much less degree, is still felt, would have left unaffected the sale and the pecuniary returns of the Directory. Mr. Lovell, we understand, has been affected to a considerable extent, by it; hundreds of subscribers have declined to receive it, from the sheer inability to pay for it; and the loss from defaulting advertisers is still more severe. In view of these circumstances, and looking upon the work as a national one, the vast importance of which, and the benefits to be derived from its general and extended circulation, are almost incalculable; regarding it in this light, we say, it offers a fair subject for government assistance and patronage. We have had all sorts of trashy tracts, and some other more bulky publications—very good perhaps in their way, but scarcely fitted to attain the object desired—printed at the public expense, and profusely circulated. Here is a work worth all these books and tracts twenty times told—the result of private enterprise and unassisted effort. It has not succeeded—on the contrary, the publisher has lost by it. Let the government step in and lend him a helping hand. Let them buy up what of the edition remains, and have it circulated among the public offices in this Province; and throughout Great Britain, wherever it is thought the possession of such a valuable work of reference would be useful and beneficial.

Weekly Review of the Toronto Markets.

COLONIST OFFICE,
Toronto, February 11, 1858.

In framing a weekly review of the market, we have very little to remark, for there has been nothing in the shape of sales transpiring in anything, to an extent worthy of notice. We apparently jog along, week after week, in the same monotonous way, with scarcely any visible increase or decrease in the supply, or any rise or fall in the prices of the different articles of produce.

WHEAT.—The supply of wheat for the week has been over 8,000 bushels, the price of which has been without any marked difference from last week. We quote the average price for good shipping samples at 4s 3d per bushel. There was a considerable quantity sold at 4s 6d per bushel during the week; but still the quantity which was sold under that figure will reduce the average price to what is above stated.

FLOUR is extremely dull of sale, and we hear of no sales to any extent having taken place.—The business in this article may be considered to be confined to local trade. The present quotations, wholesale, unchanged, viz., superfine, 23s to 23s 6d; fancy, $3 60 to $3 65; extra, $4.

BARLEY.—The quantity of this article produced this week has not been very large, but, as a great deal of that inferior; prices were from 2s to 2s 6d (40c to 50c) per bushel.

OATS have not been in very heavy supply, yet the prices do not advance, but on the contrary have a tendency downwards, and if the sleighing lasts there is no doubt large quantities will be brought from the back townships, which will lower prices.

RYE nominal, but in demand.

PEAS.—Not a great supply; from 2s to 2s 3d per bushel.

POTATOES.—A general good supply going from 2s 3d to 3s 3d per bushel per load.

TURNIPS from 10d to 1s 3d per bushel.

CABBAGES from 2s 6d to 4s per dozen.

FOWLS 2s 9d to 3s 6d per pair; ducks 2s 6d to 3s; geese from 3s to 3s 9d each; turkeys from 2s 6d to 7s 6d each,—the last quotation is for extra large birds.

EGGS—Fresh, from 11d to 1s per dozen.

BUTTER in one pound rolls, from 11d to 1s per lb.; in large rolls, 10d to 11d per lb.; firkin from 9d to 9d per lb.

PORK has been in very good supply during the week, and the quality generally very good.—Prices remain unchanged, viz, $4 75 to $5 50 per 100 lbs.

BEEF per quarter has been in moderate supply; hind quarters from $5 to $5 50; fore quarters $3 75 to $4 25 per 100 lbs.

DEER on foot from $5 to $6 per 100 lbs.

HAY—Supply moderate during the week, going from $10 to $16 per ton.

STRAW about $7 per ton in bundles.

HIDES from $4 75 to 4 25 per 100 lbs.

SHEEP SKINS 1s 3d to 2s 6d each.

COAL WOOD from $5 75 to $4 per cord.

New York Markets.

NEW YORK, Feb. 10.

BREADSTUFFS.—Flour receipts 9,200 bbls; sales 7,000 bbls; State and Western steady. Superfine State $4 15@4 25; Extra State $5 35@5 40; round hoop Ohio $4 50@4 55; Southern quiet; sales 800 bbls, at $4 55 to $4 85 for mixed to good, and $4 90 to $6 50 for fancy to extra. Wheat quiet and unchanged. Corn in good demand at easier prices; sales 26,000 bushels; Southern white 65c@66c; yellow 66c@67c.

PROVISIONS.—Pork firmer; sales 300 bbls; mess $15 85@$16. Beef steady; sales 250 bbls; repacked Chicago at $10 25@$12 50. Lard firmer; sales 500 packages, at 9¼c@9¾c for bbls.

STOCKS.—There was a long session of the Board this morning, with an active speculative business, and a general advance in prices—in some cases ½ per cent.

Sterling Exchange weak—109½ is now about the top of the market for best bills.

Money active and plenty at former rates.

BRELISH'S PATENT

ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unbeatable, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all sections in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for building purposes, cheap, unbeatable, indestructible and beautiful, and whether we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and cohesively combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Scientific, the chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so unusually near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to be distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate, forming a solid homogeneous mass (they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either under or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most fine and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices, Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Basin Tiles, or any other Architectural, Engineering, Sepulchral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all seasons of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of it being used instead of the more precious marble or stones, to form mouldings, has reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected AT FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the finer material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for those work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or that used in the composition of the artificial stone, it will cost WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed (post-paid) to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

N. B.—WANTED—Agents for Sale of Licenses or to make and vend in each county.

PLASTER. PLASTER. VIENNA PLASTER!

THE undersigned begs leave to inform the Farmers of Canada, and all concerned in the use of Land Plaster, that he is now prepared to supply all who may favor him with the patronage with the above named article.

Fresh ground and daily received by Railroad from the extensive Mills of Messrs. Rankin & Co. in the village of Phelps, Ontario County, New York.

The following analysis of this Plaster reparied by the most eminent chemist in the city of New York is proof of the superior quality of this Plaster over any other in the State of New York:—

"This certifies that I have analysed specimen of Vienna Plaster, and also a specimen of Cayuga or Onondaga Plaster, and find them to yield respectively as follows:—

Vienna Plaster.

Sulphate of Lime	70.92
Carbonate of Lime	4.35
" of Magnesia	1.50
Alumina	2.46
Silica	1.84
Protoxide of Iron	.21
Water	18.33
Loss	.39
	100.10

JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D.,
New York, March 19, 1854. Chemist.

Onondaga Plaster

Sulphate of Lime	68.20
Sulphuric of Lime	1.01
Carbonate of Lime	6.20
" of Magnesia	1.60
Alumnia	2.80
Silicia	2.46
Water	22.10
Loss	.24
	100.00

Cayuga Plaster

Sulphate of Lime	80.40
Sulphuret of Lime	2.00
Carbonate of Lime	18.00
" of Magnesia	3.80
Alumnia	4.00
Silicia	4.40
Protoxide of Iron	.32
Water	16.50
Loss	.48
	100.00

JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D.,
New York, April 2, 1852. Chemist."

It appears from the above exact that the Vienna Plaster is superior for land than of the Cayuga and Other kind, in as much as it contains the largest percentage of Lime, which is the most beneficial property in the Plaster.

Fire Insurance.

ADVICE OF AN ENGLISH JUDGE.

An admirable work of Lord St. Leonard's has recently been published in England, under the unpretentious title of "A Handy Book." It is considered to be one of the cleverest manuals ever published on the subject it treats of, especially as regards real estate. When a lawyer of his Lordship's condition and eminence turns his learning to popular account, he is entitled to the grateful acknowledgments of the community. His law is at the same time so far beyond criticism, that there is no room for doubt as to his opinions, and as an example of the manner in which his views are communicated to the public, attention is directed to the following on

FIRE INSURANCE.

"A word of advice about your fire insurance. Very few policies against fire are so framed as to render the company legally liable. Generally the property is inaccurately described with reference to the conditions under which you insure.—They are framed by the company, who, probably, are not unwilling to have a legal defence against any claim, as they intend to pay what they deem a just claim, without taking advantage of any technical objection, and to make use of their defence only against what they may believe to be a fraud although they may not be able to prove it. But do not rely upon the moral feelings of the directors. Ascertain that your house falls strictly within the conditions. Even having the surveyor of the company to look over your house before the insurance will not save you, unless your policy is correct. To illustrate this I will tell you what happened to myself. I have two houses in different parts of the country, both of which open from a drawing-room by a glass door into a conservatory. The one I had insured for a good many years from the time I built it; the other I had insured for a few years from the time I bought it, in the same office, when a partial fire broke out in the latter, and I was then told by the office—a highly respectable one—that my policy was void, as the opening to the conservatory rendered it hazardous, and if so, of course both policies had been void from the commencement. I was prepared to try the question, and ultimately the objection was withdrawn, and my loss was paid for. Upon renewing my policy, with some alterations, I actually had some difficulty with the clerk of the company to induce, or rather to force him to add to the description the fact that the drawing-room opened through glass doors into conservatories. In treating, at a latter period, for a policy with another company, I required them to send their surveyor to look at the house and the stores; and everything to which objection could be taken was shown to him. The company then prepared the policy, and made it subject to the report made to them by their surveyor, referring to it by date. This report I never saw, and the objectionable stoves, &c., were not noticed. Of course I had the reference to the report struck out, and the policy made correct, but not without some personal trouble. I state the circumstances to show you how careful you should be. I advise you at once to look to your existing policy. If you have another Arnot's stove, or made any other important change in your mode of heating your house since your policy, or you had at the time of your policy any peculiar stove, &c., not noticed in the policy, you should call upon the company to admit the validity of your policy by an endorsement on it."

Shocking Murder in Paris.

On Friday, the 15th, a mysterious murder was perpetrated at 24, Rue des Martyrs. Madame Garneray, widow of the well known marine painter, who died last year, occupied a small apartment on the third story of that house, having a servant girl, aged 18, named Anna Vasser. As Madame Garneray's sister was ill, she sent the girl on the evening in question to pass the night with her, and the next morning, between eight and nine, the latter returned home.—She was surprised to find the outer door, which she remembered well to have locked, fastened only by the latch, and on opening it was still more surprised to find the apartment full of thick smoke. She summoned the concierge, but the smoke was so dense that neither could venture to enter. They then called two stonemasons who were at work in the courtyard, and these men went in and opened the windows. This cleared away the smoke, and then Madame Garneray was seen lying dead in her bed with a pocket-handkerchief in her mouth as a gag, and a cord tied tightly round her neck.—Contusions and scratches on the hands, face and breast, indicated that she had resisted as much as she could; but her efforts could not have been great, as she was aged and infirm. The smoke had been occasioned by her bed having been set on fire, and the mattress was still slowly burning; it was, therefore, evident that the murderer had caused the fire, in the hope of removing all traces of his crime. In the apartment were several objects of value, presents given to M. Garneray by persons of distinction; but nothing whatsoever was touched. At about six, the wife of a physician residing on the fourth floor, had heard a noise accompanied by the barking of Madame Garneray's little dog, but both had soon ceased. About twenty minutes later she heard footsteps in the room, and the outer door was opened and closed. The dog was, in the morning, found in the apartment, and appeared to have been ill-treated by the murderer. As no robbery had been committed, it was thought that the murder must have been perpetrated from motives of vengeance, and suspicion pointed to a man who was known to have entertained ill-will to the deceased, in consequence of her having some time ago brought him into disgrace. This man, on being interrogated by the police, not being able to show where he had been that morning, between six and seven o'clock, was arrested, as was also his wife. It is supposed, from the physician's wife having both heard a noise in the deceased's apartment, that the man, after committing the murder, had left and then returned to set fire to the bed. The body of the murdered woman was sent to the Morgue to be subjected to a medical examination.

Protection of Female Emigrants.

The prostitution of immigrant girls at sea by the officers and crew of our packet ships has become so frequent that the Commissioners of Emigration have been compelled to a thorough investigation of the subject. They find, after careful examination, that since the establishment of steam communication with Europe, the number of cabin passengers in sailing ships has greatly diminished, and in proportion to this diminution, captains and officers of sailing ships, freed from restraint, have become more licentious and depraved. It is now a matter of frequent occurrence for the master of a packet ship to select from among his female passengers some unprotected girl, take her into his cabin, and by various artifices induce her to yield to his wishes. Following the example of their superior, the subordinate officers and crew do likewise; and thus it frequently happens that a score or more of young women, who went on board the ship with unblemished characters, are turned adrift when they arrive here, to meet a fate more dreadful than death itself.

This is a subject worthy of the most serious consideration. Years ago we pointed out this evil, and from time to time have directed public attention towards it. The Commissioners of Emigration have at length prepared a memorial to Congress, praying that the passenger law may be so amended as to "prevent by severe punishment for the act, the recurrence of this increased evil and wrong." We trust that Congress will give it early attention.—N. Y. Tribune.

The American Horse-Tamer.

On Saturday, Mr. Rarey, an American, now on a visit to England, whose skill in taming the horse and completely subjecting him, however wild, vicious, or intractable, to his will and mastery, is beginning to attract public attention, was afforded an opportunity of exhibiting his peculiar powers in this capacity before the Queen, the Prince Consort, the Princess Royal, the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, and other members of the royal family, with the ladies of the court and most of the foreign princes and distinguished visitors now in London.

To show (says the Times of January 27) that Mr. Rarey's power is not a thing personal to himself, he has since his exhibition of it at Windsor communicated the secret of it to Major General Sir Richard Airey, Lord Alfred Paget, and Colonel Hood, under the most stringent obligations, of course, that they will not disclose it to others; and Lord Alfred Paget, who is now as much a horse-tamer as Mr. Rarey, on Saturday gave a successful exemplification of his skill before her Majesty, the Prince Consort, and their august visitors, taking for his subject a beautiful dapple gray pony, belonging to the Prince of Wales. Lord Alfred was left alone with the pony for a few moments in the riding-school, and on the admission of the royal party it was prostrate on the ground with his lordship sitting, caressing it, handling its feet and legs, resting on its haunches, and in all respects treating it in a manner proving its complete subjection to him. That over, Mr. Rarey appeared with the black horse from Anderson's, in Piccadilly, to which reference has been made, and his mastery over which he showed in a variety of ways. Placing himself at one end of the riding school he called to the animal, which he had left at the other, and it immediately cantered towards him in a playful manner. It lay down at his bidding, or followed him like a dog round the building. When down, a plank was laid upon its shoulder, upon which Lord Alfred Paget ran a wheelbarrow. Finally, when the horse had regained his legs, he was mounted by Mr. Rarey, who sat on the animal's crupper with his back to the head, beating a drum and cracking a whip over him, this treatment resulted in neither motion nor fear on the part of the horse. One of the fine stud of cream coloured horses belonging to her Majesty was next subjected to the manipulation of Mr. Rarey, with an equally successful and surprising result, so far as laying the animal, which is an entire horse, down was concerned, and handling him all over with the most perfect freedom, the horse-tamer did not think it desirable, on so short an acquaintance, to carry the familiarity to the extent of opening an umbrella in his face, or cracking a whip, or beating a drum over him. Besides the frequent display of some vicious propensities, this particular animal of late has never permitted any one to ride him; but he allowed Mr. Rarey to mount him without offering the least resistance. With this the exhibition terminated, and the Queen and illustrious visitors by whom it was witnessed with the most evident tokens of interest and wonder took their departure.

It ought to be stated that Sir Richard Airey, Lord Alfred Paget, and Colonel Hood, to each of whom Mr. Rarey has communicated his secret, are understood to declare that there is nothing in the treatment in the smallest degree painful or improper towards the horse subjected to it, or which would offend the susceptibilities of a bystander sensitively alive to anything partaking of cruelty to a dumb animal.—They also assert that it consists of no trickery of any description, nor of the use of any drug, mesmeric or other similar influence whatever. Mr. Rarey's theory is that hitherto all our treatment of this noble animal—at least in the preliminary stages of breaking, and so forth—has proceeded on ideas of his nature altogether erroneous and cruel, and been invariably characterised by unnecessary violence, which has provoked the display of resistance and other hindred qualities on his part, and so the evil had been perpetrated. The principle on which Mr. Rarey goes, on the other hand, is one of extreme kindness and tenderness to the animal, the object being to convince him that man is his natural master and friend and to elicit his confidence and kindly regard. Mr. Rarey appeals to what he calls "the intellect and affections of the horse," and states this as the secret of all success. He is a slightly made man about 30 years of age, the son of the stock farmer and breeder of horses, who lived in Franklin county, in the State of Ohio, and is himself engaged in a similar occupation at a place called Groveport about ten miles from Columbo, the capital of that State. From boyhood he is stated to have exhibited an intense fondness for horses and a remarkable spirit for breaking and training them after the old fashion, until he discovered this more humane system of treatment, which he has since practised with the greatest success in his native State. The subjects on which he has operated have been in many cases reclaimed in a perfect wild condition from the American prairies, and in the course of his experience he has had one arm and both legs broken. We believe that Sir Richard Airey and Lord Alfred Paget have been requested to inquire into and report upon the system of treatment adopted by Mr. Rarey in the interest of the Government.

Walled Lake in Iowa.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette gives a very interesting account of a walled lake in Wright County, Iowa. He says:—"To me it was one of the greatest curiosities I had ever seen—enveloped as its history is with a mantle that will never be withdrawn. This lake lies in the midst of a vast plain—the rich, gently undulating prairie extending for many miles in every direction. The lake covers an area of 1,800 acres. The water is clear and cold, with a hard, sandy bottom, from two to twenty-five feet deep. There is a strip of timber about half way round it, probably ten rods wide, being the only timber in many miles. There is a wall of heavy stone all around it. It is no accidental matter. It has been built with human hands. In some places the land is higher than the lake, in which case the wall only amounts to something like a rip-rap protection. This, I believe is what engineers call it. But in other places the water is higher in the lake than the prairie outside of the wall. The wall in some places is ten feet high; it is thirteen feet wide at the base, sloping up both sides to five feet wide on the top. The wall is built entirely of boulders, from three tons in size down to fifty pounds. They are all what are called lost rock. I am no geologist, and consequently can give no learned description of them. They are not, however, natives to the 'manor born.' Nor has the wall been made by the washing away of the earth and leaving the rocks.—There is no native rock in this region. Besides, this is a continuous wall, two miles of which, at least, is in her than the land.—The top of the wall is level, while the land is undulating—so the wall is in some places two feet, and in others ten feet high. These rocks, many of them at least, must have been brought a long distance—probably five or ten miles. The readers of the Gazette should not imagine that the wall around this lake is regular and as nice as the wall around the fountain in front of the City Hall in New York, nor need any entertain the theory that it is a natural wall; but it has been built hundreds, and probably thousands of years. The antiquary may speculate by whom this mighty, as well as ornamental, work was done, but it will only be speculation. Notwithstanding the water in the lake is pure and cool, there is no visible feeder or outlet. The lake is about twelve miles north of the located line of the Dubuque and Pacific Railroad, and about one hundred and fifty miles west of the former place. The time is coming when the lake will be a great place of public resort."

The Wits and Women of Paris.

Lola Montez delivered a lecture in New York on the 8th instant, on the above. The hall was crowded.

Lola devoted much wit and illustration to her assertion that marriage in Paris was more an affair of the purse than the heart. The French woman never marries below her station, though it might happen that in the United States a young lady could fall in love with her coachman. The great want of Paris was that they had no such institution as home; and nowhere, perhaps, was this want so keenly felt out of Paris as in the houses of our own merchants—too absorbed in business to know that they need a home. It was as true of the Fauburg St. Honore as of the fifth avenue, and vice versa. This led women to devote their attention to their exterior, and there was no such degrader of womanhood as a passion for dress. (Sensation.) If this were to continue, and did not undermine female morals in the United States, then the lessons of history and experience might go for naught. (Sensation.)

She related an anecdote of a young girl going about the streets of Paris, who, on being asked by a young student where she was going, replied "nowhere," to which he answered, "then let me go with you; I am going nowhere too." There were too many young ladies going nowhere, and there are too many foolish young gentlemen willing to go with them. [Laughter and applause.] Would that there were more good Samaritans to take some of these poor abandoned girls by the hand and say to them, "Sister—my sister—we have all to live together somewhere." Of the poor of Paris, not one couple in fifty were actually married—they were happy animals. There were the invalides of Paris, the old soldiers, earning their penny a-day for airing some aristocratic dog, glad to take charge of any animal to get money to pay for their pipe and tobacco, still feeling that the "little corporal" lived and would come back to them. Scandal was unknown in France.—The custom of introductions was not observed, because it was presumed that any one you met at a friend's house was fit to be your acquaintance. The absence of scandal was the result of good feeling and true politeness. Thus she would leave Paris. Let God forgive its follies, for they were the easiest mistakes that human nature was wont to make. (Applause.) It was well known to those who had read "Lawrence Sterne," that when the spirit went up to Heaven with the single sin, the recording angel, as she wrote it down, dropped a tear upon it, and blotted it out forever. And, concluding she said, if there be any fear for this, I pray Heaven it may be shed upon the spot that records the sins of Paris. [Applause, during which the fair lecturer retired.]

Rents and Real Estate.

Some persons are wondering that the auction sales of real estate do not indicate a more marked decline in price than they do. In the first place, there are auctions of real estate which are not to be relied on, any more than stock auctions; in the second place, the time for real estate to suffer has hardly come yet. We must wait till May before we see the effect of the revulsion upon real estate; many holders will struggle even beyond that date. Real estate and rents must come down. Not perhaps small houses and moderate priced dwellings and stores; but all the palatial mansions which have been built in the upper part of the city within the past few years and all the costly stores which have been run up in Broadway and some of the streets near the Park. People will not afford either to live in such houses or to hire such stores this year. They will be sold below their original cost; or they will be rented at fifty per cent below what was paid for them last year. As an instance of the sort of property which will be affected by the revulsion, we may quote the large stores which have been built in Beekman street on the site of the old Brick Church. These buildings will not pay their owners three per cent this year; and if they should happen to be otherwise embarrassed, they must be the means of breaking them down.—N. Y. Herald.

Union of England and Prussia.

From the Liverpool Times, Jan. 27th.

The all-engrossing topic of conversation continues to be the marriage of the Princess Royal. We devote several columns to-day to a detail of the proceedings on the occasion which we have not already published. There seems to be only one feeling in the Kingdom, and that is, unbounded satisfaction at the choice of the Princess Royal. How changed from the expressions used by influential journals, when the subject was first mooted, some 12 or 18 months ago. Then Prussia and the Prussians were a beggarly and dastardly set, awe and cowardly into the bargain, for they did not know which side would prove conquerers in the Crimea, and thus kept aloof from any conquest, so that they might at any moment give their weight to the winners. Now Prussia is lauded up to the sky, its King, Princes, and Potentates are everything that is good and desirable.—But enough, the dynasties of Great Britain and Prussia are now linked together, whether for better or worse time alone will tell.

French Detectives in England.

The rumored arrival in London of several French detectives begins to attract much attention; and the report that our own police are acting in complicity with these Imperial spies causes much dissatisfaction. If we be correct that such is the fact we cannot censure it severely enough. The principle involves, not only to the refugees themselves but to the British nation the most serious consequences. We cannot permit the lawless kidnapping of foreigners in our own liberties and removing some guarantees which are the sacred props and bulwarks of our own personal security. The great palladium of British freedom is the fact that every man's house is his castle; that his home cannot be invaded, except upon the authority of a magistrate, granted upon a satisfactory presumption of guilt; and that even when arrested and placed upon his trial, the accused is still held to be innocent of the charge until convicted upon evidence by a jury of his own countrymen. We have no desire to encourage conspiracy, says a London cotemporary, but we ask, what possible functions can be performed by French detectives within the United Kingdom, against the public enemies of the Bonaparte throne which must not necessarily be incompatible with our statute law, and therefore offensive to the public, and disgraceful to the Minister who connived at them.—Liverpool Times.

The Atlantic Steamers.

The New York Express states that no vessel on the Collins line sails from that port until a settlement is had from the U. S. government, and more encouragement is offered for a continuance of the line than has recently been the case. It is reported that the government is already in arrears to the company for past services to the amount of over $160,000, and as the company is out of funds, and Messrs. Brown, Bros. & Co. refuse further advances, a suspension of the trips of the line has been rendered unavoidable. It is gratifying to note the success of the Canadian line of Steamers, which, though receiving but small subsidy from the government still continue their regular trips, and make them profitable beside. It should be borne in mind, however, that there are no such formidable competitors to contend against as the Cunarders, which by their regularity and safety have sailed down the Collins line. As a proof of the superiority of the Cunard steamships, it is asserted that the stock is over 200 per cent. premium. Very little of it is ever sold. A gentleman of Glasgow last summer offered £3,000 for a share of £1,000, but could not get it. With their first five ships they have built all their additional eight or nine ships, with the common earnings without any assessment for additional capital.

The United States Administration and the Mormons.

(From the Washington Union, Feb. 5.)

The absurd statement going the rounds of the press, to the effect that negotiations are in progress between the Administration and Mr. Bernhisel for the withdrawal of the army from Utah, the emigration of the Mormons to some island in Salt Lake Valley by the Government, is, of course, altogether destitute of foundation in fact.

The army was dispatched to Utah as to one of the military departments of the country, where its presence is required independently of the Mormons; and it would probably remain in that department in the strength that has been despatched there though every Mormon should evacuate the Territory.

The lands of Salt Lake Valley have not, we believe, been yet sold to the Mormons. They occupy them as squatters, and have never yet derived titles from the Government. It would be remarkable if the Government should negotiate for the purchase of its own lands which it has never sold.

The Mormons are believed to have no present intention of evacuating Utah. The march of a formidable force of United States troops in that direction would probably induce a serious consideration of the subject on their part; but strongly fortified as they are behind their canons and mountain gorges, well provided with provisions, arms, and ammunition, strengthened by manifold and formidable alliances with Indian tribes far and near—not to speak of the strength they command in Washington through the opposition that is manifested towards an increase of the army—the thought has not yet entered their minds of preparing for any early removal from Salt Lake Valley. The information received by the Government from reliable sources all concurs in ascribing to the Mormons the very opposite temper and purpose to the one reported; and it is not believed that they will be disposed to think of recapitulation upon any terms so long as the Government is prevented from sending a military force against them formidable enough in numbers to inspire them with trepidation.

So far from any relaxation being likely to occur in the efforts of the Administration to press on reinforcements to the army in Utah, we have conclusive reasons to believe that every resource at its command will be exhausted by the War Department for swelling and expediting these reinforcements. The preparations of the Administration will be such that whatever responsibility for mischances to our gallant army shall attach to the Government shall fall at one at the door of Congress.

Forgery on the Montreal Bank for $10,000.

THE DELINQUENT ARRESTED AND COMMITTED FOR TRIAL.

(From the London Free Press.)

One of those distressing cases which have of late but too frequently come before the public on both sides of the Atlantic, has occurred in this city where, by the guilty conduct of a young man, in whom every confidence had been placed, a respectable family has been thrown into the deepest affliction, and one of our banks defrauded to a large amount. The circumstances of the forgeries have been known in the city for many days, but with a view to spare the feelings of the family, the Press had taken no notice of the matter, waiting until the affair should come before the public tribunals. This being now the case, further concealment is neither useful nor advisable, and hence the particulars may be given fully.

The facts of the case are, shortly, as follows:—Mr. John Anderson, a highly respectable miller and cloth-worker in this city, some months since placed his son, Alexander W. Anderson, in business in the wheat and produce way. The business was conducted under the style of Anderson & Co. A banking account was opened with the Montreal agency here, and considerable transactions had taken place; indeed, paper to the amount of $24,000 seems to have been under discount. An arrangement was made by Mr. Anderson, sen., to endorse for his son. In this way business has been going on for some time past; the father endorsing the son's paper, the bank discounting it, and as was hoped, a profitable business done. But the facts prove otherwise. The young man, though attained to the mature age of 27, and married, yet allowed himself to be drawn into a vortex of temptation, and surrounded by evil companions and influences, made away with the money which the bank, on the credit of his too confiding parent had advanced. The son readily gave endorsements to his boon companions, money supposed to be invested in produce was expended on debauchery and lavished on favourites, deficiencies arose to an extent which the Bank discounts failed to cover. Ruin stared the young man in the face; and in an evil hour, instead of admitting all and seeking in a measure to amend his ungrateful conduct by a timely confession and by attempts to save something from the wreck, he proceeded to forge the name of his father to notes. This has been done not only once, but repeatedly. The two cases on which he was examined yesterday shows a total of $5,000 forgery, whilst other notes in the hands of the bank, swell the whole amount of the delinquency to $10,000!—The first note of this description was dated and discounted on November 12th last, for $2,000. On the notes approaching maturity Alexander W. Anderson prepared to leave, seeing no hope of amending the terrible position in which he found himself. On the 28th of January he left the city, proceeded West, intending to go South on arriving at Detroit. We will now let him proceed on his journey, while we look at what is doing here. Previous to his going, A. W. Anderson confided his determination to flee, to his book-keeper, Mr. Barnwell, and gave him three cheques, one for $6,000; another for $6,000; and a third for $7,000, of the respective dates of January 14th, 17th and 28th. The profits of these cheques was disposed of thus:—Young Anderson got $130; and his wife had $600; while $850 was drawn in gold for his wife to take with her (in addition to the $600.) The balance was left in the Bank, while Barnwell was entrusted with a blank cheque signed by Anderson to fill up with the amount which lies to his credit, the money to be drawn and remitted to him. Barnwell, faithful to the trust reposed in him, drew the $850 in gold; but strangely enough, Mrs. Anderson declined taking it with her, saying she was afraid she should lose it, and desiring Barnwell to remit it by express! It's an old adage that "ill news travels quickly." The flight of Anderson on the 28th, and that of his wife on the 29th, became known; the bank became alarmed; enquiry was instituted and the forgeries discovered! Barnwell now for the first time hears of the forgeries. He knew of the flight and aided in it; but of the knowledge of the forgeries he protests his ignorance. And this is likely to be the fact; for it is hardly possible that Anderson would trust his clerk with such a secret. Still, he wrote Mrs. Anderson, telling her of the father's announcement of the forgery, and desiring her to warn her husband—an ill-advised and wrong act under the circumstances. The $850 in gold is honourably given up by Barnwell to the bank, instead of being sent "by express" agreeably to Mrs. Anderson's wishes, an officer is set on the track of the offender; and meanwhile the affair is being sifted here. The bank cheque, we should not forget to say, is also given up by Barnwell to the elder Anderson who tears it up.

We now come to another phase in the story. The Bank authorities suspecting Barnwell's complicity in the matter arrest him, and he is examined. He is nearly successful in proving his innocence of a guilty knowledge of the forgery when circumstances turn out fully to confirm it. His employer, Alex. W. Anderson, is arrested and brought back, and his evidence saves the clerk!

We left Anderson on his way west. He proceeded with his $430 with the officer at some days' interval behind him. Working his way from city to city, he arrives at Louisville, Kentucky, where he stays and opens communications with his wife, and is impudent enough, also to write to his clerk Barnwell here. Having been put on the track of the fugitive, and supposing he would take the road to his father-in-law's house, the officer, John Wilson, actually finds his way to Louisville; telegrams having previously been dispatched south, east, and west, to the heads of police in the various districts. He goes to the Louisville Hotel and searches the register; while doing so, the clerk enquires his business, and on the officer's informing him, actually produces a letter, addressed "A. W. Anderson, Esq., Louisville, Kentucky." The knowledge that he was in the city or neighbourhood was now certain. The police were roused, the capture easily effected in the open street, and the delinquent brought back. The following is a portion of the letter addressed to him by his wife:—

"Waterloo, Feb. 4th, 1858.

"I am just in receipt of your letter, and was glad to hear that you were in such good spirits, but am very much afraid you are in trouble by this time. I got home all safe and trunks all right; but was thrown into terror on Saturday by a man coming and inquiring for you here. I had so much to take care of that I left the gold for Barnwell to send the next day, never doubting him or thinking he would turn right against us the moment we were gone. I telegraphed to him on Saturday, but heard nothing until yesterday, when he wrote that they had telegraphed a description of you north, south, east and west, and officers were in pursuit of you, as father had said you had forged his name to the tune of $16,000, and Bob said ten thousand. Now Alick we all know it is as base a lie as ever was invented by human tongues, and if father has perjured himself by saying so, to get rid of paying your debts, I hope he will suffer. One thing you may be sure of, Alick, that I will stick to you through thick and thin, and our folks will give me a good home till all is settled up or cooled down. It throws us into the greatest misery imaginable, and if you should ever be so lucky as to get this letter, be very cautious where you go, or what you say. Barnwell said I would be watched closely, and so Pa will go to Geneva to post this. If you get this and write again, don't put such a public wrapper on it, and direct to William Wilson." . . .

The officer was just in time to prevent the prisoner acting on the warnings given in the above letter. It is evident that Anderson had concealed from his wife the forgeries of which he was guilty. She received the first information of this sad fact from the letter which Barnwell wrote her, and in the latter portion of the letter, which we suppress, together with another under the same envelope from his father-in-law, the unhappy relation indulge in the deepest impulses of grief. Had he received it probably he would have decamped further. As it was, he thought himself secure enough, though his 430 dollars had melted down to eighteen, which the officer found on him. He arrived back here on Saturday, the 13th, and yesterday was examined before the magistrates.

POLICE COURT.

FEBRUARY, 15th, 1857.

The MAYOR, Aldermen BLAIR and GARRATT, presiding.

ALEX. W. ANDERSON was charged with uttering two notes of hand knowing them to be forged, and forging the name. Mr. Wilson attended to prosecute on behalf of the bank, and Mr. Scatcherd defended the prisoner.

MR. WILSON put in the information of Mr. Dunn, the Manager of the bank; the affidavit of Joseph Anderson, sen., to the effect that the promissory notes were forgeries of his name; and the affidavit of Mr. C. Smith, Accountant to the bank; that the endorsements were not in the handwriting of Mr. Anderson, sen. These all been sworn to before C. Monnatt, Esquire.

MR. SCATCHERD objected to the [illegible] going on on these informations and affidavits, the depositions having been made before a County Justice, and were therefore informal.

The Court, however, ruled that as the prisoner was before them, and the witnesses in court, the case might go on, on its own merits.

MR. WILSON put into court two notes, in which the case against the accused was founded.

MR. DUNN was the first witness, who deposed as follows:—Is agent for the Bank of Montreal here. Note for $2,000 now before me, and dated November 12, 1857, for three months, was presented for discount by prisoner and discounted by the bank. The note is drawn by Anderson & Co., and endorsed by Joseph Anderson, senr. Was acquainted with his signature; did not believe the endorsement on the note was his signature. There was a standing arrangement made by the father that he should endorse his paper. Prisoner therefore presented, by implication, on tendering the note, that the endorsement was his father's.

Cross-examined by Mr. Scatcherd. Discovered that it was not the signature of Mr. Joseph Anderson on his denial of the endorsement, and by comparison with other signatures. Believes that the body of the note was in the same writing as the endorsement. Nothing was said specially at the time of the discount, that the endorsement was the prisoner's father's.

JOSEPH ANDERSON, sen., sworn.—Am father of the prisoner. The endorsement of my name on the back of this note is not my handwriting. (Here Mr. Anderson became deeply affected.) The arrangement with the bank was, that he should endorse his son's paper. (The witness examined the note attentively.) Had no idea it was any one else's writing but his son's. It looked most like his writing.

By the Court.—The arrangement with the bank was, that whatever money his son wanted he was to endorse it; and was to see that the money was properly applied for the purpose of purchasing produce &c.—Never authorised his son or any one else to use his signature.

MR. ANDERSON, sen., here volunteered the statement that that very morning his son had acknowledged to him that he alone had signed the notes. But his accomplices had now surrounded him, and got up a defence of him. The father added that it was horrible that the evil associates of his son should endeavor to draw him from the right path when he had got him to acknowledge his faults. His son had admitted that he had forged his father's name, but did not know to what amount. (Sensation.)

JOHN WILSON, Constable, deposed to taking the prisoner in charge in Louisville, Kentucky, on Wednesday Feb. 10th.

This completed the charge on the first note.

A second charge for the forgery of a note for $3,000 was next gone into, when precisely similar evidence as the above was adduced.

Mr. Scatcherd, on behalf of the prisoner, reserved his defence.

The prisoner was then formally committed for trial, and the witnesses bound over to prosecute. The Court refused to accept bail in the case.

We should state that A. W. Anderson fully exonerated his book-keeper, Mr. Barnwell from any knowledge of his banking account. Mr. Barnwell was released from his bail [six thousand dollars], and discharged, there being no evidence to show that he knew that the money drawn from the bank was the produce of forged notes.

The Attempt on Napoleon's Life.

THE REFUGEE QUESTION.

Paris (Jan. 26) Correspondence of the London Times.

Public opinion in Paris is still occupied with "the question of the refugees, and the steps that may be taken by our government to check on its own territory the plots of conspirators and assassins." In my despatches that may have taken place between M. de Persigny and our government on that subject, I have little doubt that anything like a peremptory tone has been carefully avoided, and that it will be left to the latter to take the initiative and do what he can consistently with the state of the laws. There is, however, one point on which no difference of opinion can possibly arise between our Foreign Minister and M. de Persigny. There is no denunciation that M. de Persigny can utter against the men who have repaid the hospitality granted to them in England by plotting for the overthrow of governments with which we are in amicable relations, that will not find an echo in Lord Clarendon. M. de Persigny cannot, indeed, say too much on the subject. It is one that touches us very closely; such acts are as ungrateful and criminal, abuse of confidence, and tend to impair our entire dealing with the subjects of foreign governments, who are ignorant of our laws and our customs. Neither on that, nor on the still deeper crime attempted to be committed by the wretched men who are now awaiting their trial, can there be a diversity of opinion. That the English authorities are ready to co-operate in the detection of crime and the bringing criminals to justice is shown by what is reported to have already occurred at Jersey where, on the French police had communicated to their agents abroad on their English confrères the important information which the Mauvais Sujet has, stated was in their possession so far back as the month of June, it is probable that the attempt would not have been made.

Whatever turn the negotiations may take, or whatever be the steps adopted, I have every reliance on the intelligence and judgment of the Emperor. The impression that was produced by the allusion to England in the address of the Free Masons of the French Legislative Chambers, proceeded, no doubt, by some real and serious information, and not by any mere idle rumour, or vague suspicion, in the shape of a threat. The Emperor, in his answer to the deputation, spoke in the most kind and conciliatory manner of the relations between the two countries and their governments.

[illegible] for the [illegible]

He is aware, if they are not, that there is no country on earth where the conspirator or assassin is more abhored than there. He cannot doubt of the good feeling of the English people towards his person, and of the willingness of their government to use every means the law actually affords to bring the assassin and his accomplices to justice. The address of felicitation from 935 British residents in Paris, voted by acclamation, as well as those in England, proves the fact, if any proof were wanting. It is, perhaps, to be regretted that in some of the addresses from French subjects, as published in the Moniteur, there should still appear protestations against "the asylum accorded to vile wretches whom every civilized nation should expel from its territory," because the ignorant or unreflecting may be led to the inference that assassins are "protected" in England. The English law presumes every man to be guiltless until his guilt be proved. The French authorities are bound to furnish proofs against those who plot against them, and it will then be seen whether England is the protector of conspirators or assassins.

I have said that the Emperor knows England far better than any of those gentlemen who think to show their zeal by declaring against her institutions. If they doubt the fact, I can prove it. In the complete edition of his Majesty's works published in Paris in 1853, I find the following passages in the chapter headed "De la Liberte en Individuelle en Angleterre" (vol. I p. 411.)—

"No inhabitant of Great Britain (excepting convicts) can be expelled from the United Kingdom. Any infraction of this clause (the Habeas Corpus act) would be visited with the severest penalties.

After describing the nature of that great guarantee for personal liberty, his Majesty says—

"There is in England no public prosecutor, for the Attorney General only intervenes in very extraordinary cases. There is no doubt that many criminals escape justice from the want of such a functionary; but, on the other hand, personal liberty incurs less risk of being violated. But its not merely the laws which protect the citizen; it is the manner in which they are executed; it is the manner in which the Government exercises its power. In England, authority is never influenced by passion; its proceedings are always moderate—always legal. In England, those violations of a citizen's domicile so common in France, under the name of domiciliary visits, are unknown. In England, the secrets of families are respected, and correspondence remains intact. In England, the first of all liberties—that of going where you please—is never disturbed, for there no one is asked for passports—passports, the oppressive invention of the Committee of Public Safety, which are an embarrassment and an obstacle to the peaceable citizen, but which are utterly powerless against those who wish to deceive the vigilance of authority."

I beg to submit this high opinion on the passport system to M. Cauvain, of the Constitutionnel.

The Emperor alludes to what he calls the "exorbitant power" once claimed by Parliament on the subject of arrest, and says—

"But then the accused would appeal to a power which has never been found wanting in England when it is invoked for the protection of liberty—I mean public opinion. For it must be admitted that, however good the laws may be, the government might infringe them, or turn them to its advantage, if public opinion were not ever ready to arrest when it deviates into injustice. In truth, a law or a charter deprived of the general support of opinion would be a mere scrap of paper. But it becomes a sacred ark when the public interest guarantees all its words, and that to efface but one of them, or not to execute the whole, is for the government a sentence of death."

Again—

"It suffices for us to note this fact, that in France, where such jealousy is shown of everything which touches equality and national honor, people do not attach themselves so religiously to personal liberty. The tranquility of the citizen may be disturbed his domicile may be violated, he may be made to undergo for whole months a preventative imprisonment, personal guarantees may be despised, and a few generous men shall raise their voice, but public opinion will remain calm and impassible as long as no political passion is awakened. There lies the greatest reason for the violence of authority; it can be arbitrary because there is no curb to check it. In England on the contrary, political passions cease the moment a violation of common right is committed; and this because England is a country of legality, and France has not yet become so; because England is a country solidly constituted, while France struggles by turns for forty years between revolutions and counter revolutions, and the sanctity of principle has yet to be created there."

Such was the opinion of the Emperor of the French in 1854, and such I believe to be his opinion in 1858. If these remarks had appeared in any English paper there is not a scribbler in the French ministerial press who would not cry out on them as calumnious, and as evincing gross ignorance of France and French institutions. I have no doubt that the great functionaries who erroneously thought that they would please his Majesty by denouncing the protection given to political refugees in England have long had in their possession the work from which I quote. I fear, however, that they have not as yet paid the august author the compliment of reading it. I should, I confess, like to know the opinions of the Pays and Constitutionnel on the passages.

It was announced that the trial of the authors of the attempt to assassinate the Emperor would take place on the 5th of February. It now appears that in consequence of the numerous commissioners appointed to collect evidence in France and in foreign countries, and of Pierri's correspondence having been discovered by the activity and intelligence of the English police in Birmingham, the trial cannot take place till the end of February.

A Sad Anomaly.

The Brunswick (Mo) Journal has the following:

"A stone-mason named John Farris had resided in this city for some time. He was esteemed by every one for his industry and upright conduct. He married a young country girl, by whom he had several children. He built him a house, and lived in peace and comfort—for he could easily earn three dollars a day.

"John Farris was a good Catholic and one of the most zealous members of the little congregation in this place. He was supposed to be either an Irishman or Scotchman.

"What then was the surprise of all on learning that this honest workman and father of a family had just been arrested on authority as a fugitive slave!

"Certainly it never would have entered into the mind of any one, however obtuse the faculty—especially when his intelligence and estimable qualities were considered, that John Farris had African blood in his veins. But the Judge, to whom, without doubt, were furnished undisputed evidence of the former condition of the unfortunate man, surrendered him up to the Deputy Marshal of Alabama, and Farris was taken away to Slavery, leaving behind his wife and family and the little home, which, by long years of industry, he had reared.

"Farris is owned by a man named Raglan, residing in Alabama, from whom he escaped in 1852, and after many dramatic adventures took refuge in Pittsburg; but a man named Shaw, who had been sent out in pursuit, succeeded in discovering him, and the poor slave had to leave precipitately. It was then that he conceived the project of coming to Brunswick.

"The wife wished to follow the husband to Alabama, but, after much entreaty on his part, she consented, for her children's sake to remain behind.

"Some friends of the unfortunate family subscribed $3,000, which they offered for the release of Farris, but Raglan, the master, refused to sell.

The Hospital on Blackwell's Island Burned to the Ground.

NARROW ESCAPE OF THE INMATES.

From the New York Times, 15th.

We mentioned in our second edition Saturday, that the hospital on Blackwell's Island had been entirely destroyed by fire. The fire originated in the private kitchen of the resident physician, and was discovered by one of the watchmen at 3¼ o'clock Saturday morning. The alarm was immediately given. The two fire engines stationed on the Island were called into requisition, and the convicts being stationed in line, passed buckets of water from the river to the building. About fifty prisoners from the Workhouse and Penitentiary were brought out and did good service but without avail. The inmates of the hospital, about 550 in number, were taken with the utmost despatch. The flames spread so rapidly that it was impossible to remove any of the furniture and bedding. From Dr. Sanger's kitchen, which was situated in the basement of the middle building, the fire spread rapidly to the rooms above.—The physicians of the institution, and their families and servants—in all about fifteen persons—occupied this part of the building. Most of them were, of course, asleep when the alarm was given.—They had no time to dress themselves or to remove their valuables, but with the utmost expedition made their way out. There were about 530 patients sound asleep locked in the wings of the building when the fire broke out. They were all saved. The doors were opened as soon as possible, and all who were able to walk made their hasty exit. Those who were too ill to help themselves were carried out by the officers of the institution on the Island who were quickly on the ground. All the inmates of the hospital were soon placed in comfortable quarters. The men were taken to the workhouse, and the women were conveyed to the building formerly occupied as a manufactory of portemonnais and razor-strops. Meanwhile, the flames had spread to the two wings of the hospital, and the whole building was in a blaze. A strong wind from the north prevailed, the engines were out of order, and all the efforts of the officers and convicts to save the building seemed to retard the progress of the flames but very little. By 8 o'clock the asylum was in ashes. Nearly all the personal property in the building was destroyed. The hospital was situated on the southern end of the Island, between the new Small-pox Hospital and the Penitentiary. It was probably in a measure owing to its exposed position that it was consumed so quickly. The middle building was 75 feet long and 60 feet wide. The two wings, one on each side of the building, occupied by the officers of the hospital, were each 125 long and 50 feet wide. One of them was occupied exclusively by female patients, and the other was appropriated to the use of diseased persons of the other sex. The hospital would accommodate about 600 patients. The edifice was three stories high, and was built of stone. The cost of building it was about $50,000. It was clumsily constructed, and it is doubtful whether its destruction by fire has not prevented a more serious calamity. A small building, known as "Mayor Tiemann's Cookhouse, adjoining the hospital, was, with difficulty saved. The entire loss to the city is about $100,000, and is not covered by insurance.

The correspondence from Calcutta, to Dec. 24th, adds nothing of importance to telegraphic despatches, which anticipated the mail.

The Times' correspondent gives a circumstantial account of the Windham affair; but the facts do not differ from those already before the public.

The scenes after Windham's defeat are said to have been fearful. The hospitals were crowded to suffocation. The enemy directed their fire specially upon them, and it was not till Sir Colin Campbell returned, and, with a dozen haughty words, brought every man to his place, that order was restored.

CHINA.

The correspondent of the Times, writing from Canton river, under date of Dec. 16th, says that Yeh has returned an insolent answer to the ultimatum of the English and French plenipotentiaries, and that the two forces would in a few days attack Canton.

Lord Elgin's demand was of the most temperate character. He asked for no more than that the treaty should be carried out—that Canton should be put upon the same footing as other treaty ports; its gates to be open to commerce; that compensation be given for damages to British merchants, and the occupation of the Island of Honan be acquiesced in as a guarantee, until all matters are settled. Yeh's answer to Lord Elgin is said to be couched in a sarcastic vein. He tells his Lordship that the question of the treatment of strangers at Canton, has been settled by the Emperor's decree; that Sir George Bonham was made a Baronet for respecting that decree, and recommends Lord Elgin to follow his example; and as for compensation, Yeh had demanded it of the British Government, for loss and sufferage, by China, a few days before this answer was received.

Mr. Reed, the American Commissioner, solicited an interview in the city, and Yeh replied that he would meet him outside of the city; but that no barbarians should put their foot within the limits of Canton.

The addresses from some of the regiments to the Emperor are worded so strongly that they attract much attention. The Zouaves regretted that they had no opportunity to manifest their zeal in a striking manner, and the address of the 82nd regiment contains the following sentence:—"If your Majesty wants soldiers to reach these men even in their haunts, we humbly pray you to designate the 82nd regiment as part of the advance guard of this army."

Attorneys as Merchants.

(From the Canada Law Journal.)

There was a time in the early history of this Province, when, from motives of necessity rather than propriety, one and the same person was permitted to follow both a profession and a trade. Then the card "A. B., Attorney-at-Law, and dealer in lobsters," might not have offended good taste.

We can understand this, and the reason of it. To draw a line between callings though inconsistent, when to endeavour to live by either alone would have been to starve, might at the time have been impossible.

Be this as it may the Legislature of Upper Canada in 1822 saw fit to prohibit the meretricious union. They declared by 2 Geo. IV. cap. 1 s. 43. "That after twelve months from the passing of the Act, no Attorney of this Court (King's Bench) being a merchant, or in any wise concerned by partnership, public or private, in the purchasing and vending of merchandize in the way of trade as a merchant, shall be permitted to practice in the said Court during the time he may be such merchant or engaged as aforesaid, or until twelve months after he shall have ceased to be such merchant or so engaged as aforesaid."

We infer that at the time of the passing of the Act, there were some Attorneys who were also merchants, and that, for this reason, twelve months were granted that they might choose between the one calling and the other. After that period the callings were to be severed. Is it not right and proper that they should be so? In the first place, it is due to the profession that the status which the profession gives to a man among his fellow men should be maintained. In the second place, it is due to the public that no man should be allowed ostensibly to trade with them as a merchant, but practically to manufacture law suits. Our only surprise is, that in the present state of the profession, there is a man who so far forgets himself as to outrage both these duties. We do not say positively that there is such an one; but from the letter of a correspondent in other columns, we infer this to be the case.

In England there are several disabilities under which an attorney is placed. One is, that he cannot be a Justice of the Peace. Another is, that he cannot be a barrister. The disabilities are imposed for the good of the profession, and of the public. The man who knowing them becomes an attorney impliedly contracts not to follow any occupation, or accept any office incompatible with that of his profession. If he do, he breaks his contract, and is liable at the hands of the Courts of which he is an officer, to be punished by suspension or dismissal. Owing to this cause it is common for an attorney, desirous of doing what as a professional man he cannot do, to apply to be struck off the roll.

Our s. 44 of 2 Geo. IV. cap. 1, though repealed by 20 Vic. cap. 63, is re-enacted by s. 22 of the latter. It, as we have seen, prohibits an attorney from "being a merchant or in anywise concerned by partnership public or private, in the way of purchasing and vending of merchandize in the way of trades as a merchant." The word "merchant," strictly speaking, means a man who traffics or carries on trade with foreign countries, or who exports or imports goods and sells them by wholesale. (see Webster.) This cannot be the meaning intended by the Legislature, in the Act under consideration; for it falls short of guarding against the evil which the enactment is designed to prevent.

Many words describing particular avocations, have a popular as opposed to a strictly correct meaning. We speak of a man being a "watch-maker," who never made a watch in his life, and who never hopes to do so. If his knowledge enables him to clean a watch, repair a balance wheel, adjust a hand, or insert a main spring, he does all that is expected of him by the public.—If described strictly his name would be "watch repairer," and not "watch maker." So here we think the word 'Merchant' must receive its popular meaning, viz: any person who deals in the purchase or sale of any goods, whetuer raw or manufactured; whether purchased in a raw or sold in a manufactured state; and whether purchased or sold by retail or wholesale. Such is the only reasonable interpretation to be placed upon the Act.

It is a maxim that Ubi lex est special is et ratio ejus generalis generaliter accipienda est. Thus the Statute 5 Hen. 4, declaring that none be imprisoned by any Justice of the Peace, but in the common goal to the end that they may have their trial at the next Goal Delivery or Sessions of the peace, has been thought to extend to all other Judges and Justices; (Dwarris 567.) Here it will be observed, there is a special provision, having a general reason with a general acceptance. So in the Act precluding attorneys from being 'merchants,' the reason is a general one which equally excludes retail traders and manufacturers, and must have a general acceptance so as to embrace them.

But not only is an attorney prohibited from being a merchant, but from being, 'in anywise concerned' in the purchasing and vending of 'merchandize.' Whatever is usually bought and sold in trade, whether of manufactured or raw material, is merchandize. Flannel, for example, is merchandize. A man, therefore, who buys wool, manufactures it into flannel, which he sells either by wholesale or retail, is 'concerned in the sale of merchandize.'

It is provided that a person contravening the Act 'shall not be permitted to practice,' which means that upon application he may be suspended or struck off the rolls at the discretion of the Court. This course we advise whenever or wherever the occasion arises. No case of the kind has ever, that we can learn, been before the Courts. We are certain that there is no reported case. We hope that the day is far distant when there shall be occasion either to decide or report such a case.

The Russian Navy.

The following facts from the Moniteur de la Flotte relating to the Russian navy are not without interest:—

"Previous to the last war the Russian ships in the Black Sea were chiefly built at Nicolaieff, but the river being too shallow to permit them to embark their guns or their stores, these objects were taken on board at Sebastopol. On the arrival of a new ship at the port a warehouse was placed at the captain's disposal for himself, his officers, and his crew, and he occupied it as long as he remained in port. By this system an entire fleet might be prepared for sea in two or three days, or even, if necessary, within twenty-four hours. This system though expensive is at the same time economical, inasmuch as every ones ship's stores are preserved in a good state by the same men, for the crew of a Russian ship never quit her during their period of service, except in case of accident, and their period of service lasts 20 years. The seamen always remaining in the same ship become attached to it, and an emulation is created among the various ships, which tends to establish good discipline. A French naval officer who had an opportunity of observing the manner in which Russian captains manœuvre their ships, expressed himself in the following terms in the year 1850:—

"The manner in which a Russian crew handle their sails, the silence which reigns on board, the agility, intelligence, and zeal displayed by the seamen are something surprising when one considers that those men have been taken from the plough to be converted into seamen. Previous to coming into contact with a Russian ship I never saw the three top-sails of a corvette changed in less than three minutes, particularly when they are set. I now see it every day, and, if I can credit the assertion of the Russian captains, their largest ships are handled equally well. The manner in which they anchor, heave their anchors, and set sail before leaving port is remarkable for the celerity with which it is performed." The same officer added, "that the discipline on board a Russian ship of war is perfect, and that it is not the result of corporal punishment, as has often been asserted, for flogging is reserved for such crimes as robbery and desertion. According to an excellent authority the Russian navy suffers from the difficulty of finding recruits, and this arises from the slow developement of the merchant navy, notwithstanding the encouragement afforded to it by the Government for the last 150 years. The best merchant seamen are the Finns of the Baltic, the Cassacks and Greeks of the Black Sea, but their numbers are far below the necessities of the State. For that reason the crew of a Russian ship of war is infinitely superior to that of a merchantman. The maxim of Peter the Great, that every man is good for everything, is applied more easily in Russia than in any other country, and for that reason seamen are levied not only on the sea coasts but in the interior of the country. The dislike the Russians feel for sea service, is at present beginning to disappear in consequence of the Emperor Nicholas having educated his son Constantine for the navy. The time is past when the officers of the Russian navy were in the habit of wearing boots and spurs, and of repeating that they would soon exchange into the cavalry."

The Credit System in Oxford.

In the Insolvent Debtors' Court, on Monday, Edward Scratton appeared. The insolvent, a young man who had been an undergraduate at Oxford, applied to be discharged from prison. The case disclosed some extraordinary circumstances. The insolvent owed in the aggregate, from October, 1844, £36,348, of which £19,675 were without consideration, and £12,255 more than once entered, leaving the debts for value £4,517. On the other side he had bad and doubtful debts due to him, £6800. He had become entitled, under the will of his father, Mr. John Scratton, of Rochford, Essex, to a considerable property, and had spent large sums. The insolvency was attributed to the amount he had paid for interest, discount, and bonuses, with the debts incurred without consideration. There was one item in the proceedings of £30,000, as having been paid between 1848 and 1853 for discount, interest, and bonuses on money lent.—There were about 130 creditors on the schedule, and six debtors. The insolvent had had transactions with Joseph Joel, Leon Solomon, Alessandro Stiaple, and others; some with 60, 70, and 80 per cent. They took £50 on a £100 bill and it sometimes happened that £40 was charged to renew such things, and the whole £100 went. Mr. Commissioner Phillips said it was a dreadful exhibition of extravagance, commenced at Oxford University, and carried on till the debts were nearly £100,000, and a property gone which would have kept the possessor in affluence all his life. He had rarely seen such a schedule before, and he hoped he should never see such again. It was a lamentable exhibition of reckless extravagance. There being no opposing creditors the insolvent was discharged, with a caution to avoid getting into debt, and to redeem his conduct.

The "Leviathan."

(From the Illustrated London Times.)

Success has at length crowned the efforts of Mr. Brunel, the Leviathan having been placed on Thursday in so satisfactory a position that her launch at the next spring tide (on the 29th or 30th inst.) will not be a matter of the slightest difficulty. We give in brief the daily progress of the ship to the water during the week.

The operations at Millwall were resumed on Monday, and were attended with unusual success, an average advance of twenty feet having been made in the course of the day. The monster seemed to yield each time to a comparatively low rate of pressure, the gauges on the hydraulic presses seldom indicating more than 20 cwt. per circular inch at each ship, and each time therefore the vibratory motion was proportionately diminished. No ship was longer than three inches, but they took place so constantly as to effect in the course of the day the advance we have mentioned.

Mr. Brunel and his assistants were early upon the ground on Tuesday morning; and when the pressure was applied, a little before eight o'clock the vessel began again to move, and continued to progress satisfactorily until a little after three, when, having gone 16 ft. 10 in. aft and 15 ft. 1 inch forward, it was thought desirable to suspend operations. When the tide was at its height on Tuesday, the vessel was 74 feet in the water, which had the effect of diminishing the resistance to the amount of 4000 tons. At one time the vessel was so completely surrounded by water, that Mr. Brunel, jun., was rowed round her. The Duchess d'Orleans, the Comte de Paris, with their attendants, were in the yard during a considerable portion of the day; and Mr. Robert Stephenson, M. P., likewise remained for some time.

On Wednesday the neighbourhood of the yard and river bank was crowded with spectators, who evidently seemed to think that, as the launch was nearly finished, their long patience would be rewarded by seeing the monster get up steam and travel down the river on her first trip. The only distance, however, accomplished on Wednesday was one solitary slip of two inches and a half. At high tide on Wednesday there was ten feet seven inches water round her, which it was calculated took off about 5,500 tons of her dead weight on the launching way.

On Thursday afternoon the Leviathan was pushed down the ways to the full extent she will be required to go before the actual launch, which is postponed for the Spring tides of Friday, the 29th inst., or Saturday, the 30th. Five or six feet remain at the extremity of the ways; but the power now required to move the vessel will be so small that there will not be the slightest difficulty in hauling her off at the full tide. All the preliminary operations are therefore complete, and no doubt is entertained by Mr. Brunel about his being able to get the vessel into the water one of these days. She will then be fitted up with all possible despatch, and the public will be admitted on payment of a fee to be hereafter regulated. Her Majesty and Prince Albert have intimated their intention of inspecting the vessel when she is afloat. In the morning there were hundreds of eager visitors. Owing to the quantity of water under the vessel at high tide in the afternoon, she yielded easily to a pressure of 13 cwt. to the square inch.

The new main paddle-shaft has arrived at the yard. It is, apparently, a wonderful piece of forging, being all in one piece, and weighing upwards of thirty-two tons.

This wonderful vessel is the work of Mr. I. K. Brunel and Mr. Scott Russell, and the opinion generally entertained of her by ship-builders and persons competent to form an opinion, is that she is likely to be just as much better as she is bigger than those who have gone before her. Very much less favourable, however, is the opinion entertained as to the commercial results of the undertaking by merchants and others who affect to understand the subject; but we should bear in mind that equally unfavorable opinions were expressed in regard to the traffic of the Birmingham Railway.

When application was made to Parliament for a bill for that work, it was gravely stated by authorities apparently the most competent to judge, that one train a day each way would do all the business that could possibly arise between London and Birmingham. And what is now actually the result? Why, that the trains are now so dangerously and inconveniently close upon the heels of each other, that the line has to be widened to enable it to carry the constantly-increasing traffic upon it. This enormous trade is caused by the main line being fed by innumerable branches and roads. May we not, therefore, reasonably expect that the increased facilities offered for ocean navigation by the Leviathan may in the same manner create a trade for her; and, doubtless, there will be branch steamers running in every direction to meet her, and supply her with passengers and cargo.

☞In the United States Senate, on Wednesday, it was proposed to assign a portion of the gallery to the use of Reporters for the Press, whereupon Senator Toombs thus expressed his views—"I hope the resolution will be over. I object to its consideration. I do not think there ought to be any such people in the galleries at all. It is a very great nuisance." The N. Y. Herald observes:—"Mr. Toombs is loftily contemptuous towards reporters. If there were no 'such people' in existence he Senator's reputation would be a great deal more limited than it is."

Important Railroad Movement.

The Cobourg and Peterboro' Railway Company have made themselves quite satisfied of their incapacity to overcome the difficulties of preserving their crossing over Rice Lake, and therefore give notice of application to the Legislature to have their charter amended, so as to allow them to branch off at a point below their summit rise, and passing round the head of the Lake, connect with the Port Hope and Peterborough line, which will then be continued to Omemee, and so open a direct communication with Lake Huron. It was predicted from the commencement of the undertaking by Cobourg, that Rice Lake would prove a formidable barrier to the successful management of the road, but the decreased length and the laudable ambition of independent action, determined them in removing as far as possible from the jealous rivalry of the sister town of Port Hope. After spending large sums in the fruitless effort of building against the Winter action of the Lake, they find that not only all they have done is in vain, but that they can adopt no certain means of accomplishing that object, and that abandoning all they have already attempted, their next experiment would be ruinous in its own cost. Consequently they have united their interest to that of Mr. Fowler, who has a lease for 999 years of the portion of the Port Hope and Peterboro' Railroad, lying between Millbrook and Peterboro', by which it is agreed that, upon their getting legislative power to do so, the Cobourg and Peterboro' Company shall enter Peterboro' on the Port Hope line, and have their station upon its grounds; and since there is no room for objecting to the application from Cobourg an agreement has been entered into with Mr. Fowler, as contractor, by which he undertakes to commence at once the operation of uniting the two roads. Peterboro very naturally feels an intense interest in the change, as hitherto, the connection by Rice Lake has been found quite unequal to the necessities of her trade, and so it would be for all time to come, while the alteration proposed will give Peterboro' the immense advantage of choosing between two outlets, to either of which they can arrive at an equal expense, and with equal certainty; besides a union of strength will arise between Port Hope, Cobourg and Peterborough, and will enable them to act with a force not only hitherto unknown to them, but which they have been exerting antagonistically to each other. By the union the extension to Lake Huron will more certainly be secured, and with it the increased manufacturing advantages which belong to Peterborough. Cobourg and Port Hope will reap a reward commensurate with their capacity and their efforts to please, and Peterborough will lend her influence and her credit in a joint scheme of extension, that will bring her on to the main line connecting Lake Huron with Lake Ontario and the Grand Trunk Railway. In anticipation of this grand result, every improvement of a local character which is superfluous to our necessities should be held in abeyance, in order that our utmost vigor can be employed in its realization.

Obituary.

We have this week the melancholy duty of recording the death of the lamented JUDGE HALL; an event which took place on Wednesday morning, the 17th inst. The body of the deceased was committed to the grave, on Saturday last, in the presence of a vast concourse of afflicted friends, who had eagerly embraced the last opportunity of testifying their appreciation of his public and private virtues. Mr. Hall, who had risen with the rise of Peterborough, became, at an early age, the chief person in the neighbourhood. In 1844, being then only in the twenty-sixth year of his age, he was elected to represent the County in Parliament, and in 1848 he was appointed to the County Judgeship, then vacant by the death of Mr. McKyes. This position he continued to fill to the day of his death, and it is recorded of him to his great credit, that his exposition of the law in the County Court, and his decisions in the Division Courts, won for him a universal reputation for honesty, and sound reasoning, such as under like circumstances is rarely accorded. But Mr. Hall's public usefulness was not confined to public occasions; he was ever ready to give counsel to such as applied for it, and remove the occasion of a recourse to the law for redress, and in this spirit his friends have as much ground for grateful reflection as they have in the faithful exercise of his public functions.—Though his race of life was short, it is not the less instructive in its incidents, but will furnish ample opportunities for the lasting remembrance of all who have been thrown in his way. George Barker Hall was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1818, and was therefore in his fortieth year at the time of his death.

☞Hon. Sidney Smith has been returned for West Northumberland, his opponent, Mr. Grimshawe, having retired from the contest before the polling days arrived. The local advantage to be expected from the return of the Post Master General operated magically upon the political sentiment of the Riding. But if our vision is not much clouded, an end will shortly be put to their fine perspective, for Mr. Macdonald's government has but a day to live, and no new government will take in Mr. Smith.

☞A valued correspondent in Dummer sends us the following sensible and Christianlike remarks, upon the continued incarceration and cruel treatment of McHenry, the suspected perpetrator of the Townsend murders:

MR. EDITOR—Will you allow me to say a word or two in reference to poor McHenry. I am one of those—few or many—who are convinced that he is McHenry, therefore not Townsend; and consequently, so far as respects the crime for which he was lately brought to jail, and the one for which he is now lying in a dungeon, an innocent man. Your article from the Spectator (issue of the 9th inst.) makes it probable that he is treated with cruelty, and that his sufferings are very great. I know we are told to "bless and curse not;" but if poor McHenry in the bitterness of his soul—shivering in a cold, cheerless cell, with "a chain and shackle" fastened to his leg, and knowing that he never committed the crimes for which he has suffered and is now suffering so much misery, physical and mental,—if, I say, he were to curse the men who have brought it upon him, and the Government which allows them to inflict it, and the laws which sanction it, and the Christian Clergy who look on and never once make a public, united effort to bring it to a close—aye, and every one of us who look on too, and whose pity exhausts itself into a French shrug and the exclamation—"poor fellow!" I verily believe it would be God Almighty's curse, and not the wretched captive's. Our Legislators can make laws heavily punishing any one who keeps a pig a leg bound for a longer time than when it is travelling 15 miles, even with the softest wooden or cotton string—(see statutes of last session c. xxxi.) Is there none of them will bring in a bill to prevent a Sheriff or Jailor putting a chain of iron round a human being's leg, who had been convicted of no crime, and who is therefore as innocent in the eye of the law as the petty despot who puts it on?—in the eye of Heaven it may be many times more so! In conclusion, I would, with your permission, respectfully suggest to those who, greatly to their honor, are trying to do away with the childish tyranny of imprisonment for debt, to include the crying grievance of cruelty to unconvicted prisoners in their proposed petitions to Parliament.

ARRIVAL of the BALTIC.

THE LEVIATHAN AFLOAT.

Departure of the Prince and Princess of Prussia.

FRIGHTFUL COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

The attempted Assassination of Napoleon.

UNFAVORABLE REPORT FROM FIDDS.

NEW YORK, Feb. 19.

The Africa arrived out at Liverpool at 11 30 p. m. on Saturday 30th of January.

The steamship Leviathan was successfully floated in on the Thames, on Sunday 31st of January. Arrangements had been perfected to complete the launch on the day previous, but the prevalence of a heavy gale rendered a postponement imperative, as Sunday proved most auspicious, it was determined to proceed with the operation rather than encounter the risks which further delay would have entailed.

The final floating of the great ship was effected with perfect ease, and no accident of any kind occurred, although the river was literally covered with boats full of people, and lumbers forming cradles, which had been kept down by the weight of the vessel, ascended with great force some 20 or 30 feet above the surface of the water. The scene was a brilliant one, and the enthusiasm of the multitudes who witnessed the launch was manifested in loud and continued cheering. The Leviathan was towed by four powerful tug-boats to her mooring opposite Deptford, where she will remain until her internal arrangements are completed.

The Prince and Princess Frederick William of Prussia left England on the 2nd inst. They proceeded from London by railroad to Gravesend, where they embarked in the Royal yacht, under a salute from Tilbury Fort, and the squadron in attendance, and amidst enthusiastic cheers of the assembled crowds in the city of London and all along the route. There was a perfect ovation to the young couple.

General Ashburnham who was appointed to the command of the British forces in China, but was transferred to India, had suddenly returned to England without leave, because, as it is said, only a command in the Punjaub was suggested to him, which did not answer his expectations.

The Morning Advertiser reiterates the rumour that Mr. Vernon Smith is to be raised to the Peerage.

A frightful colliery explosion had occurred at a pit near Ashton under Lyne. About 100 men were in the pit at the time. It was feared many of them were killed. At latest dates about 40 had been taken out alive, some more or less injured, and 2 dead.

A large reform meeting was held at Birmingham on the 2nd of Feb., and resolutions were adopted declaring that no measures of reform would be completed without household suffrage, and the ballot. Chartists' amendments for universal suffrage were defeated by a large majority.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times, under date Jan. 29th, writes, that a very numerous and highly respectable meeting of Americans was held that afternoon in Hotel Du Louvre, to express their sentiments on the recent atrocious attempt to assassinate the Emperor of the French.

It is said that five great directions of police are to be created. Each Director General is to be under the orders of the Minister of the Interior. The names of marshals to have command of the new military divisions received by the Niagara were incorrect. According to most reliable authority, commanders will be Marshals Baraguy, D'Hilliers, Canrobert, Bosquet, Magnan and Castellane; while Pellessier will have supreme control over all with the title of Marshal General.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times reports that the improvement which was beginning to be observed in the general trade of the country had been checked by rumours in regard to the restrictive measures proposed by Government, and the violent language employed in the military addresses to the Emperor.

Wheat and flour had declined in price in almost all the markets of France.

An engineer named Deiterts, is said to have invented an apparatus which is destined to effect a complete revolution in the construction of locomotives, and to save 30 per cent in the amount of combustibles at present consumed.

The project of a submarine tunnel between France and England had been submitted to an official commission named by the Minister of Public Works.

Letters from Paris mention the failure of Mr. James O'Dier, one of the oldest and most respectable banking firms of that city. Liabilities estimated at £200,000. Hopes were entertained of a resumption.

A steady improvement in the Lyons silk market is reported, under the influence of orders for the European spring trade.

The London Times is requested by General Changarnier to state that as the decree which called several French Generals has not been reported, it is not his intention of present to return to France.

In Paris on the 1st, the project of a new law was read in the

The country would, we conceive, support the Government in any just interference for the suppression of such hideous plots as this which has just failed at Paris. We do not wish England to be made an asylum for the most cruel and dastardly assassins. But we are bound to say, that the language of the President of the Senate and other officials, in their congratulatory addresses, is not calculated to win favor for any overtures of the French Government. We can well imagine the indignation and horror with which all Paris regards the late deed, and can excuse any warmth of expression on the morrow of so heinous a crime. But the insinuations that England has erected itself as a citadel from which assassins may go forth, and the hope that now this country will not remain intrenched in its selfishness, but will unite with the Continental Powers to drive the democrats from Europe, constitute a style of language to which we could not be expected to respond amiably. But we would warn refugees of all sorts that they have no mercy to expect in this country if they be detected in a plot against a foreign government. They came here freely, they live here in security, and they may depart when and how they will. While here they have all the right of our own people, and no man can molest them. But if they attempt to pursue their bloody schemes on English ground they must prepare for the severest punishment which the laws of the land can inflict.

The Conspiracy Against Napoleon.

Paris, Wednesday, Jan. 27th, 1858.

The sensation created by the late attempt upon the life of the Emperor, is far from subsiding. New developments serve to show that the conspiracy was not an isolated one, or at least that the few individuals concerned in the attempt of the Rue Lepelletier, were not animated simply by personal passion in endeavouring to destroy the life of the Emperor. From England, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland, and Spain, we have evidence that many of the revolutionary refugees were awaiting the coup of Orsini and Pierri, in order to make an irruption into France, and to raise the standard of revolution in all the revolutionary States of Europe. The plan of the attempt, and its execution, were perhaps the work of these two desperate men; but the party to which they belong, in all its European ramifications, were apprised of the moment at which the attempt was to be made and were prepared to take advantage of its result.

It is reported that one of the prisoners, Rudio, has turned State's evidence, and that, in his confession, he has revealed a plot that does not offer a very smiling perspective for the Emperor. According to Rudio's confession, the conspirators were five hundred in number. They are bound to their work by a terrible oath, and their object is the assassination of Louis Napoleon. Each year, or oftener, if circumstances will warrant the attempt, the whole band are to draw lots from a box in which there will be five winning numbers. The five numbers drawing these are held to put in immediate execution an attempt upon the Emperor's life, which shall be approved by the whole society, and by those who are charged with its execution. The society has plenty of money for carrying out its designs.

Whether this confession of Rudio be true or not, it is evident that on all the frontiers of France the revolutionists were waiting the blow in order to enter the country and institute a new order of things. The execution of their sworn design is, therefore not abandoned; it is only adjourned. There are plenty of desperate men besides Orsini and Piegri in the revolutionary ranks—men who, like them, are willing to sacrifice themselves to what they deem a sort of martyrdom for the general good of Europe.

The trial of the conspirators will not take place, perhaps, for a month. If the affair were personal to the individuals arrested, there would be no delay; but the work of gathering evidence from foreign States will necessarily occupy some weeks. The greater part of this evidence will come from England, the late residence of the conspirators. The efforts of the English police have already led to valuable results in the discovery of papers, which establish important links in the chain of the conspiracy. From England, also, we receive a complete history of the antecedents of the principal prisoners. These histories are published in the English journals, and you will not fail to remark that the name of Miss Meriton White appears on the surface again in connection with this affair. In the Count Orsini's history of his life in the Austrian dungeons, which was published some time ago in London. Miss White's name appears as its translator from Italian into English, and as the author of its preface, which is a warm eulogy of the subject of the biography.

The two principal conspirators, Count Orsini and Colonel Pierri, have revealed very little in the various secret examinations to which they have been subjected by the magistrates. They profess not to know each other, and deny all participation in the affair. A considerable number of arrests have been made since the date of my last letter, and it is said that more bombs have been found. The attentions paid by the Police to foreigners are very embarrassing and many arrests have been made on the most frivolous grounds. The reproach addressed by the Emperor to the Prefect of Police, "That his Police were the worst in the world," since he could not find the conspirators when he knew that they were in Paris, has only served, of course, to make this already unscrupulous body still more unscrupulous and indiscriminating in its proceedings.

Emile de Girardin's wordy flourishes about a "Constitutional Opposition" and the "Empire with Liberty," could not have fallen more mal apropos; for directly upon the heels of this attempted new organization we have a demonstration from the Emperor to the effect that a curtailment of the present liberties (!) of the French people is essential to public order in France and to the general tranquility in Europe. We have reason to believe that before the late attempt, and at the very moment when M. Girardin was eliminating his new doctrine, the Emperor was deliberating upon new repressive measures, and that he was only waiting for an occasion to render their introduction easy. The occasion has presented itself in the late attempts on his life and the wheel is already in motion. After the suppression of La Spectateur and La Presse several other journals were informed that the same fate awaited them if they did not moderate their language for the future. The suppression of some foreign journals published in the French language was also demanded. A French provincial journal uses to itself for the following silence: The [illegible] chief, after his notice of the Emperor's speech on the occasion of the [illegible] assembly, according to the [illegible] the observ[illegible] discourse [illegible] The Prefect's [illegible] contained [illegible] to which the fact is recorded—"according to the telegraph"—when every one knows, says the Prefect, that the cheering must have been of the character indicated. Again: a professor in a literary institution, who had been heard to call in question the enthusiasm which was attributed to the Parisians in favour of His Majesty, was called before a country Prefect, the words were acknowledged, and he was discharged from his functions.

But the most serious blow upon the liberties of the French people is dealt by a decree from the Emperor in the Moniteur of this morning. This decree divides France into five military divisions, each of which is to be commanded by a Marshal of France, under the title of commandant Superieur. Marshal Magnan, it is supposed, will still retain command of what has heretofore been called the division of Paris and Marshal Count Castellane of the Lyons division. The other will be commanded by Marshals Pelissier, Canrobert, and Bosquet. The decree states that one of the objects of this new organization is to secure a greater facility in the suppression of troubles within the State, as each of these Marshal-Governors will have extended powers in his department. This is France not only a despotism; it has receded into a military despotism, the most execrable of all; for the new organization of the Empire would of course be unmeaning if the military governors were prefects, sub-prefects and magistrates of their respective districts. And all this in the name of public order, progress, prosperity and civilization.

The Presents to the Princess Royal.

From the London Times.

Yesterday afternoon the representatives of the public were admitted to Buckingham Palace to see the magnificent collection of bridal gifts which have been presented to the Princess Royal by every member of the Royal family, by the most of the illustrious guests who have lately honoured her Majesty with a visit, and by some of the chief personages of the illustrious house with which she is now so happily connected.

The exhibition of wedding gifts on those occasions is generally made with some display of taste and skill in the combination of colors and general effect, so as at least to exhibit the objects fairly, if not to set them off to advantage. Under such circumstances, and with proper management, such displays are often very attractive; and with the intense interest which attaches to all relating to the Princess Royal, it would not be easy to render gifts to her other than deeply interesting. If anything, however, could have detracted from the effect, and even interest, of these magnificent cadeaux, it was the manner in which the functionaries connected with the Palace displayed them. We do not speak of the style in which they were put together on a table in a small billiard-room. It is quite possible that the arrangement might be a matter of taste; but it surprised us to find that many of the presents were left without anything to indicate the quarter from whence they came, and the only information beyond the name of the person who gave it, which it was in any case possible to obtain was the cost price of almost every article exhibited, and whether it was silver gilt, or only gilt on "metal." This ungracious knowledge, which is generally kept so carefully in the background when gifts are in the question, was, as we have said, almost the only kind obtainable beyond the actual sight of the anonymous articles to which it related. One functionary, however, possessed not even this limited information, though he knew the things "were very valuable as he was put there to prevent them being stolen." Most of the articles, however, were ticketed with the name of the illustrious individual from whom they came, so that a catalogue raisonnee could be formed which we append, only as a general rule withholding the price list. The most conspicuous among the brilliant mass was the present of the King and Queen of Prussia—a lofty open coronet of diamonds, the design of which, with its spires of brilliants and open shell work between, is probably one of the most chaste and graceful that has ever been executed. Equal with this are those given by her Majesty. The first is a broad diamond necklace, with a treble row of the most brilliant drops and long pointed terminals, which match the light tracery of the coronet. The second gift of the royal mother consists of three massive brooches, somewhat in the style and size of the Scotch plaid brooch, but which, having an open circlet in the middle, are in each case filled with a noble pearl of the largest size and purity of colour. The Prince Consort gives a superb bracelet of brilliants and emeralds, which is beautiful both in design and execution, and is altogether a most costly present. This has additional interest in the eyes of visitors from its being one of the bracelets which the young bride wore at the Royal Chapel on Monday last. That which she wore on the left arm was also a diamond and emerald bracelet, presented by the gentlemen of the Royal Household, but which, though a splendid present, and probably equal in value to the Prince's, is much inferior to it in design, and still more so in the manner in which it is set.

The gift of the Prince of Wales is in rich beauty of effect far superior to them all. It is a suite of ear-rings, brooch, and necklace of opals and diamonds; but the opals, in play of colour and irridescence, are superior to any we have yet seen, and the design of the settings is quite in keeping with the exquisite beauty of the stones they inclose. As we have said, in magnificent, and at the same time chaste effect, this gift surpasses all. But the present of the bridegroom is perhaps the most costly, though in appearance the [illegible] simple of any. It is a necklace of pearls, and our readers may easily judge of their [illegible] when we say that the necklace, though full-sized, only requires 36 to complete the entire circle, which graduates in size, from the centre tapering less and less in size of jewels as it approaches each end. The three centre pearls in this superb circlet are said to be of great value. The Queen gives a third present of three silver candelabra, which form the most regal looking group of silver we have ever seen. The centre piece springs from an elaborate base, and is surrounded by large groups of figures exquisitely chased in full relief. This supports between 20 and 30 branches, and is four feet high. The two others are to match the centre, and are equally elaborate and almost equally massive and lofty. There was no ticket to indicate whom this was given to, one of the authorities stating most positively that it was a present from the Queen to the bridegroom, while another asserted that it was presented to the bridegroom's father. As, however, the former statement seemed infinitely more probable, we must believe it to be the correct one. The Princess of Prussia gives a truly regal gift of a stomacher brooch of brilliants. The stones in this superb ornament are large and of the purest water, and the setting and design are exquisite. The Princess Alice gives a small, but beautifully formed brooch of pearls; and the Princesses Helena, Louisa, Victoria, give each a massive stud brooch or button, similar in shape to those in diamond and pearl of the Queen's gifts, which we have already mentioned. These brooches are of massive gold ornamented with pearls and emeralds, pearls and rubies and pearls and sapphires. The Duchess of Cambridge gives a noble bracelet of diamonds and opals, and the Princess Mary her portrait in massive gold frame and stand. One of the most beautiful of all, however, is the gift of the bride's royal father-in-law, the Prince of Prussia. It is a magnificent necklace, with pendants of exquisite design. It is composed of pure brilliants and turquoises, and is called, from the size, rarity, and value of the latter gems, the turquoise necklace.

The bride's grandmother, the venerable Duchess of Kent, gives a most magnificent and useful present. It is a large and most costly dressing case, containing sufficient articles to fit out the toilet-tables of a dozen ladies of quality, and all of which are of massive silver gilt, enriched with bright red coral. The simplicity and exquisite beauty of the designs for these things are not to be surpassed. Next, probably, to this in costliness, though infinitely reduced in regard to size, is the gift of the Mahajah Duleep Singh, which is one of the most fairy-like opera-glasses ever used by a lady. The design is elaborate—arabesques of gold on white enamel, with a double border and enrichment of diamonds. In a little card-box, with a delicate fringe left out to show the pattern, is the gift of his Majesty the King of the Belgians. It is a Brussels lace dress made expressly for the young bride, and our readers will be best able to judge of its exquisite beauty and carefully elaborated workmanship when we state that it is valued at no less than 50,000f. or £2,000 sterling. The Duchess of Saxe-Weimar gives a magnificent bracelet of rubies, diamonds and emeralds, and the Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Cobourg gave plain gold bracelets with enamel miniatures of the givers on each. Conspicuous among the piles of jewelry and plate is a characteristic gift, a large edition of the sacred volume—a Bible, bound in the most costly and gorgeous style. On the fly-leaf is inscribed:—

"The Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society to her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, on the occasion of her marriage, with sincere prayers to Almighty God for her happiness in time and in eternity.

"SHAFTESBURY, President.

"January, 1858."

There is also a writing-desk to match the dressing-case, and in which the contents are equally valuable and chaste. This is the gift of the Duchess of Buccleuch. The Marchioness of Breadalbane gives a toilet hand-mirror, with the frame of massive gold set with pearls, and the handle composed entirely of one brilliant cairngorm. Other things are there, too, which were rich and costly in the extreme, but none of them were ticketed, nor was it possible to ascertain from whom or whence they came. Of the little presents from the schools at Balmoral—the gifts of embroidery and Berlin work—the thousand nameless little tokens of affectionate remembrance which the young bride has received from all parts—not one was shown. The bad taste of such an exclusion needs no comment. It was, however, stated that all, even of what was costly, had not been displayed. This may very likely be the case, and may also account for the absence of any gifts from some of the late Royal guests.

Death of the Queen of Oude.

The Queen of Oude died at Paris on Sunday, the 24th instant, of grief and affliction. The Queen had only arrived in Paris on Thursday. The Overland Mail says, "The unfortunate lady left England a few days ago, in very bad health intending to proceed to Egypt, and eventually, we believe, to Mecca. She rallied slightly after her arrival at Paris, and hopes were confidently expressed that she would be able to proceed with her journey. But these good symptoms were delusive, and she breathed her last on Sunday, we believe, in her fifty-fourth year. She was attended in her last moments by Dr. Rover, one of the Emperor's physicians. The prayers enjoined by the Buddhist religion were said over her death-bed.

The funeral took place on Wednesday at Paris, and was conducted with extraordinary magnificence. The body was embalmed on Monday night, and for the purpose of the operation, according to the custom of the religion to which the deceased belonged, it was found necessary to construct a kind of wooden platform in the court yard of the hotel, whereby the body of the princess could undergo the process of thorough ablution. The features of the deceased were very little changed. No incisions were made for the operation of embalming as is usual in Europe; the people of the suite, who themselves effected the operation introduced aromatic substances and perfumes through the mouth, ears and nostrils, and repeatedly annointed the body with odoriferous oils and essences. The body was afterwards wrapped round with bands of fine muslin, and the whole covered with a crimson cloth embroidered in gold. After this had been done, the religious service commenced. The females, whether relatives of the deceased or ladies of the palace, and afterwards the officers and servants entered successively into the chamber where the body was laid out, and where two priests recited the prayers prescribed by the religion in which the princess had lived. The females uttered deep groan and the men showed every sign of grief. No light was burning in the room, but fire was lighted in the court, which was, according to custom, to be kept burning until after the body had been removed. The hearse and mourning coaches arrived at the door of the Hotel Lafitte at 10 o'clock in the morning, but were sent away again, in consequence of the fire not having been burning long enough. The funeral procession was not formed till two o'clock.—The hearse, which was entirely covered with silver tissue, was drawn by six white horses. The chief mourner was the youngest son of the late Queen, Mirza Hasmet Lekendal Bahadar, who bears the title of General, and is a brother of the sovereign now confined in Calcutta. He is a man of about thirty years of age, of good height, and rather corpulent. He wore on his forehead a diadem ornamented with rubies, and was dressed in rich silk and velvet robes. This high personage arrived from London on Tuesday, and on presenting himself at the Hotel Lafitte all the officers and servants in the Queen's suite prostrated themselves before him. It is worthy of note that Mirza Bahadar, while following the coffin on foot, leant on the arm of General D'Orgoni. A very great crowd assembled in the Rue Lafitte to see the procession pass. When the body left the house a number of Indian women of extraordinary ugliness, but dressed in rich and picturesque costume, appeared weeping in the balcony; they were probably attendants on the late Queen. There were about a dozen natives who followed Mirza Bahadar as mourners on foot, and there was a line of ten mourning coaches all filled. The body was interred in the Mussulman Cemetery at Pere la Chaise. It appears that the deceased did not belong to the Buddhist religion, but was a Mahometan. Her name is inscribed on the register of deaths at the Mayoralty of the second arrondissement as "Malka Kaouwar, Queen of the kingdom of Oude; died Rue Laffitte, aged 52 years." A blank is left for the place of her birth, which none of her attendants were able to state.

Communications.

To the Editor of the Port Hope Atlas.

Sir,—Will you please inform the scribbler of that cabbage-leaf-sized paper called the "Guide," that if he thinks that he can turn the scale of the "Branch against me he is quite at liberty to try it on. It seems he is going to open his budget next Tuesday, and let out some wonderful discoveries he has made. I wish you to call his attention to the following letter, and ask him what he has to say for himself on that account:—

28, Cliff Street,
New York, Feby. 10th 1858.

Henry Mason, Esq., Cobourg, C. W.,

Dear Sir,—I am again under the necessity of writing you in relation to a settlement for the railroad iron shipped to Port Hope. Mr. Conger arrived here last Friday, and waited for Mr. Smith, the President of the Company, until Saturday evening, when he left for Albany without making a final settlement with me. This morning I have a note from him stating he should leave for Montreal on his return home. He left with 76 Bonds of £500 each, but I have no notes. These he stated Mr. Smith would bring with him and the other portion of the securities.

Mr. Smith, however, does not make his appearance, nor have I the least intimation when he may be here. The whole thing appears to be neglect of the President of the Company, and I am quite at a loss to explain the cause of delay. I consider the conduct of the gentleman in charge of the road most strange and inexplicable. I learn from Mr. Conger that Mr. Fowler is most anxious to have the account closed. Perhaps you will see that gentleman, and explain my position to him, for really the delay is not only vexatious but of the most serious inconvenience, and unless I hear from the parties shortly I shall most certainly sell the Bonds I hold for their account and commence a suit for the balance. Please advise by telegraph what has been done, and oblige,

Yours, very truly,
SEPTS. CROOKS

As for Mr. James Smith, I wish to say a little to him on account of what he said to me in their office. His words were as follows: "Fowler, we have been through the mill once, and we have got our eyes open. Zimmerman has had us under his finger and thumb, and he has robbed us when we were looking at him."

Now, Mr. Smith, if Zimmerman has robbed you whose fault was it? He could not do it without the sanction of your engineer. And, who was your engineer?—if I am not mistaken, it was T. C. Clarke your own brother-in-law. Now, I do not believe Zimmerman has been settled with yet, and I as a stockholder, call on you and the other Directors to have an investigation, and if you can prove that Zimmerman robbed you, well then make that firm refund, the same as Cobourg did. I do not believe you would have said to me that Zimmerman had robbed you if you were not prepared to prove it; and as you said contractors wanted watching, now is your time to show the town something.

Now, Mr. Editor, I think we will let them slide this time, and see what disclosures they make on Tuesday.

Yours, truly,
JOHN FOWLER.

Legal Prohibition.

To the Editor of "The Examiner."

Sir,—Please insert the following Report, adopted by the Lodge at a regular meeting held February 16th, 1858, and oblige the members of Friendship Lodge No. 146 I. O. of G. T.

By order.

WM. KENNEDY,
W. Secretary.

Your Committee appointed to prepare a statement of the views of this Lodge in reference to a Prohibitory Liquor Enactment, present the following

REPORT:

That whereas certain statements have gone abroad having a tendency to cause a misunderstanding with regard to the principles and aim of the Independent Order of Good Templars, it becomes incumbent on this Lodge to emphatically state what its views are with respect to that great question of the day,—the Legal Prohibition of the Liquor Traffic.

Resolved 1st,—That nothing short of a Law prohibiting the Manufacture and Sale of intoxicating liquors as beverage, would satisfy the members of our organization, believing that the baneful traffic can never be eradicated from our land by any other enactment.

Resolved 2nd,—That while we employ every constitutional means within our power for obtaining such a law, we maintain that unless we individually and collectively work for the advancement of the cause of total abstinence by moral suasion, we would fall far short of what a temperance organization should be, and in view of this fact, we use it as the great engine by which to secure all that we aim at, namely, the reformation of our fellow-men, and the total overthrow of every semblance of the traffic.

Railway Company of Port Hope.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

Sir,—A good deal of newspaper correspondence has recently taken place between myself and Messrs. Jno. Shuter and James Smith, respecting the Railway Company of Port Hope, which I dare say the people of Peterborough have seen and made their comments upon.

I have, however, a little more to say on the matters under discussion, and also take the opportunity of laying before my Peterborough friends an alteration about to take place in railroad affairs, which will prove highly advantageous to their interests, and to the speedy prosperity of the town and neighbourhood, in which I feel certain I will have their hearty co-operation and support.

I would first take occasion to remark that both the Messrs. Smith have expended a vast amount of virtuous and unnecessary indignation upon an humble individual like myself, and lawyer-like have raised special pleas and side issues quite wide of the real facts of the case and the main question involved; their whole statements from beginning to end are full of misrepresentation, error, and high coloring, with a grain of truth here and there mingled among the tortuous mass, but so well covered up that it is almost impossible to discover it.

I have good reason to complain of the manner in which the Messrs. Smith have treated me since I agreed to lease the Millbrook Branch and build it, and in the latter capacity I may here inform those gentlemen that it is with me alone they have to deal as contractor; a marked change took place in their conduct towards me from the moment that I resigned my interest on personal request in the Port Hope and Lindsay line. I am free to admit it did not take great pressing to induce me to withdraw as I never had much confidence in it, but be that as it may, a fitful and cessation of their's stopped into my pledge and from that time I was looked coldly upon and in the way, as one whom it was exceedingly desirable to get rid of by any means, fair or unfair; these gentlemen could not resist the ruling impulse of their nature, got power over others and show it at once, let this Contractor of ours say that we are wasting and pulse him feel it, we will make him kiss the rod and bow down to me, or will annoy him and cramp him in every way we can, force him to do as we like, or throw up his Lease and Contract in disgust. I appeal to all Port Hope if this is not a true picture of these would-be dictators. Watch other men, indeed all the town of Port Hope and township into the bargain, is insufficient to watch them, or to deliver them from their snares and foils.

But what are the facts as between these gentlemen and myself. I took the Contract for the Branch at the lowest figures known as set in Canada, and engaged to complete the road from Millbrook to the boundary of the Corporation of Peterborough in one year from the signing of Lease and Contract. What have I done? In five months the road was so far completed as to be ready for opening. My own Engineer, who surveyed the road, located it, and who has never been off it for a day, made up a careful estimate of the whole work, shewing what it would take to complete it when the Spring opened, and place it in a condition to obtain a certificate from the Government Inspector. The sum put down as sufficient, and which I deem more than sufficient, is less than the amount named in the contract as a reservation and collateral security for the performance of the entire work; and this percentage he it remembered, is calculated not only on the work but on the Iron also. The Engineer deducts then, the sum estimated to finish, and the ten per cent. together £9,800, shewing £41,200 as that due to the Contractor on the first of February, including his own stock, and less whatever payments had been made up to that period by the Municipalities of Peterborough and Port Hope, both on work, iron and all other materials; this left a balance coming from Peterborough of about £4,000, and from Port Hope of £3,000, including provision for payment of iron.

On this state of matters, when I required every shilling that was due to me to pay for labour and right of way, I was met with Messrs. John Shuter and James Smith informing me that there was nothing due me by their Engineer's account, and that I required watching. I would like any man placed in my position with heavy demands upon me for work done, and completed at a great sacrifice to me, and requiring the most persevering energy to accomplish it in order to meet the views and wishes of all interested in the undertaking—to be told there was nothing due to me when the Port Hope payment amounted to £5,000 on £10,000 stock, while my Engineer's statement retained 10 per cent in their hands on this stock, and showed £3,000 due to me less the repayment made. Is it any wonder, then I say, that I should turn from these gentlemen in anger and disappointment, and retaliate upon them in return for such treatment? Sir, it is not the paltry and insignificant reasons assigned in these gentlemen's published letters that I attach importance to, it is being told nothing is due to me when my Contract is nearly finished, it is being met in this way as a return for my exertions in having the road ready for opening seven months in advance of my Contract. If I had misapplied the funds provided for the road, or had paid a price for the work, their suspicions and their watchings might have had some shadow of grounds and given cause for expressing dissatisfaction, but no such charge has been made, nor can be made.

Paltry and insignificant as many of the allusions made by the Messrs. Smith are, I have good reason to complain of them on account of the manner and the time in which they were forced upon me; they were, however, only parts of the wire-pulling which were to produce more important results. At a time when I was justly entitled to every assistance and encouragement which Port Hope could give me through the Company and those connected with and under them, I was kept back in my work, detained, hindered and annoyed, by trifles which should never have existed, and having arisen could have been immediately removed had the Company so pleased, and by these and other causes of a similar nature, I have entailed losses to a very considerable amount, which in all fairness and equity I claim that Port Hope or the Company will reimburse me. Among the more prominent of these I may mention the delay in forwarding the iron, chairs and spikes—the loss entailed on the settlement for the iron—solely caused by the delay, carelessness and indifference of leaving the Harbor Debentures, and thereby producing a double injury, in forcing the application of Government Debentures set aside for that purpose, having to be used for the payment of labour on the road. The iron used in the construction is of a better and heavier quality than required by the Contract, which was done for no other reason than to promote an early opening of the road, and with the view of pleasing all parties, but it is not reasonable that I should be allowed to be the sufferer on that account, nor that I should not be remunerated for building some three-quarters of a mile of road over and above my Contract.

I have now to say to the people of Peterboro' that I have faithfully done my part, and more than my part by them, and will continue to do, and give them every satisfaction in my power for the confidence they have reposed in me: their road is now ready for opening at any time when it suits Port Hope to provide the rolling stock and settle with me on fair and equitable terms—on their shoulders lies all the responsibility for what has taken place, and what may take place hereafter.

And now I have but little space and time to place before you the fruits which this disagreement has already produced been myself, the Port Hope Co., and Messrs John Shuter and Jas. Smith. Is this: A revival of that scheme which almost all of you in Peterboro desired to see carried out when the rival roads of Cobourg and Port Hope were first mooted before the public namely a road round the head of Rice Lake branching to both places. The Cobourg people are now satisfied that they have been in error and find too much to contend with in Rice Lake and an unfavourable grade, the one against nature the other contrary to the rules of science—What they now propose is to abandon their road from Peterboro' East to the south shore of the Lake, and adopt a route branching off from their present road some two miles south of Cold Springs, proceeding through a valley in the plains to the head of Rice Lake, passing the saw mill there, and proceeding from thence to Bloomfield and Centreville, and continuing by Seculer's Mills to intersect the Peterborough Branch at or near the boundary between Cavan and Monaghan.

I may say this scheme is matured, and in proof of it, the Surveyors will be at work immediately and the line completed by early Fall, the entire distance being only fifteen miles. The estrangement between Cobourg and Peterboro' by the plan entered into will be entirely removed, while a fair competition for a division of the trade of Peterboro' will exist between Cobourg and Port Hope, both possessing equal facilities and equal conveniences for carrying on the large and growing business of this back country.

The scheme cannot but enlist the strong sympathies of Peterboro', embracing as it does most favorable arrangements for her, with two open doors for the transaction of her business, while it concentrates the entire Railroad interests in her very midst, with one outlet over her own road branching at the boundary to two important Towns on Lake Ontario; while from Peterboro' it will cover the ground up to Perry's Mills and from thence to Chemong Lake in time to be followed by a connection with Omemee and finally to Lake Huron.

Nothing can give Peterboro' such an immediate impetus as this, it ought to reconcile all interests and to promote unity of action, good feeling and good will between the three Towns, which nothing can dissunder, and where such oneness of opinion does exist, there can be little danger that every difficulty (should any exist,) will be easily overcome and removed by the parties interested.

It is sufficient for me to conclude by saying that I have faith in the plan about to be entered upon, the business capacity of Cobourg we well know; they are agreed, I am agreed to take the contract, and do the work, and see my way clearly how it is to be effected, it will certainly take place, and ought to have the hearty concurrence and good feelings of every well-wisher of the Town of Peterboro'.

For the present, Gentlemen,
I remain, your obliged Friend.
JOHN FOWLER.

Commercial.

Commercial Matters.

(From the Toronto Globe, February 18.)

We are glad to perceive that a very general movement is being made in getting out the produce of the country, and as far as practicable, realizing money thereon. The good sleighing enables farmers in all parts of the country to convey with ease heavy loads of wheat. The universal scarcity of money, and the probabilities of a continuance of low prices, compels them to the determination that it is as well and better to sell now, when the roads are good and they are not busy, than to wait till Spring when it will be difficult to get produce to market, and they will be crowded with the Spring work.—Certainly every day spent in bringing out produce will add another to the short season in Spring, and inasmuch as the past year has shown that it is not a wise policy to repose all on the fall wheat crop, every day gained for Spring labor is worth a great deal. This consideration, if others of far more weight were not evident, show it to be the wise policy of farmers to sell now.—There can be no doubt but this is the general conviction, and we feel assured it requires only a moderate and safe amount of accommodation for ninety or even sixty days on the part of the banks to get forward to the lake shore the great bulk of last year's crop; to be either sent forward immediately by rail, or to lay in store ready for early shipment in the Spring before the Canals are open, when stocks in the East are exhausted, and when prices will in all probability be better.

Among the manifold evils of our banking system made so painfully evident in the present depressed state of trade, there is none more glaring and unjust than that of favoritism to particular persons. It will be remembered that the Board of Trade, in its last annual report, made allusion to this abuse, and strongly condemned it, and now that there may be many applicants for discounts, we hope there will not be so much partiality. Such practices are wrong in themselves—wrong, because contrary to the spirit and objects of banks, their institution and characters—and wrong, because like any other error, they grow, increase, and are aggravated by tolerance and use. The loanings of large sums to extensive speculators and pet customers prevents the distribution, in fair and equal proportions, to honest, industrious, and deserving persons, whose credit is equally as good for comparatively smaller amounts. The practice is in every way injurious. By limiting accommodations to a few, instead of distributing them generally, the capacity of the bank for doing good to the greatest number is circumscribed; that mutual and reciprocal dependency which should exist between bankers and merchants is violated, and the utility of the one, and the interest of the other, become seriously affected. The best customers of a bank judiciously managed are the whole solvent trading community, and not a few; for banks, as well as individuals, have their periods of trial and adversity, when they need the sympathies and good will of the entire public. A spirit of mutual kind feeling and reciprocity of action should be cultivated, as indispensable to the common interest of banks and merchants live by each other; both exist together, and without mutuality of purpose, neither can prosper healthfully. The inherent errors of the banking system, as well as the pernicious practices which are incident to it, are the legitimate objects of legislation, and certainly some action is necessary. This, with other questions deeply affecting the commercial interests of the Province; should come up before Parliament, which assembles next week, and if nothing is done, at least some of the disabilities under which the trade of the country labors should be discussed.

The trade in merchandize, so far as the city is concerned, is without improvement, and indeed in any department we have no change to note. It is too soon yet to expect any revival consequent upon the movement in produce, but in the course of a fortnight the aspect of affairs may begin to brighten. It is expected that the remittances from country merchants will increase, and ease be thus imparted to the money market. On the whole, the week closes with a much better feeling in commercial circles.

We have another week's news from Europe, bringing interesting items of financial intelligence, all pointing to an abundance of money and increasing difficulties in its employment at very very low rates of interest. The Bank of England has reduced its rate of discount to 4 per cent, and a still further reduction is spoken of as necessary, applications for discounts having almost entirely ceased, while the bullion continues to accumulate. This is cheering news, but, on the other hand, the produce markets continue depressed, with lower rates, and with but poor prospects of improvement.

From the date of our last review until Tuesday, we were much disappointed in the supplies, and had begun to fear that the advent of snow and excellent sleighing were not sufficient inducements to increase the number of sellers on the market. On Tuesday and Wednesday, however, there was a large turn out, and more produce changed hands in those two days than during any one week for the past three months. There appears to be a simultaneous movement all over the country, and wherever there is a market for wheat, the deliveries are increasing. Contrary to the expectations of many, farmers seem much inclined to accept the prices offering, and the more this disposition is evinced, the sooner may we get easier terms. We are also glad to notice that the wheat recently brought out is of a much improved quality, and we have samples before us fully equal to the magnificent crop of 1855. On the whole, the week closes with a more cheering prospect, as far as the wheat trade is concerned. The supplies of other articles of produce do not increase in proportion, and prices for articles of family use continue high. There can be no doubt, however, that there are large quantities of produce in the country, and it is hoped that the comparatively good rates, the scarcity of money, and the pressure of debts, with the good roads, will soon cause a movement in other articles besides wheat. The demand for local consumption is active, and all the produce brought in is sure to find ready sale, although supplies increased to any large extent would depress prices. Our friends in the country must not therefore be disappointed if they do not realize many of the rates hereinafter quoted, as they are based on sales that have occurred during the past week, and probably afford but a slender indication of the quotations current during the ensuing week.

WHEAT.—The deliveries of wheat on the market for the week ending Tuesday night, amount to 15,000 bushels, which shows a large increase on the receipts of any previous week since the middle of November. The price has also improved, ranging, as a general thing, from 85c to 95c (4s 3d to 4s 9d) for the best shipping wheat, and 70c to 83c (3s 6d to 4s) for inferior. On Tuesday, some few loads of very choice sample, realized one dollar per bushel, but these purchases were, of course, the exceptions. The average price for 5,000 bushels on Tuesday was not over 85c (4s 3d), notwithstanding the high outside figures; because a great bulk of the day's receipts was really not worth more in proportion. Yesterday about 4,000 bushels were brought in but the market was hardly as buoyant, 95c (4s 9d) being the outside figure. Yet for the general sample, as good prices were realized.

The demand is very brisk, and competition more keen than for some time past. Excepting a few loads for local mills, the entire purchases have been made on speculation, equally for merchants in Toronto and in Montreal. Purchases are also being made in various parts of the country for this account, and we cannot but hope that the gentlemen who come forward so opportunely with their money, will be rewarded for their enterprize. They are men of large capital and have facilities for obtaining money not enjoyed by many.

SPRING WHEAT.—There is still an active inquiry for Spring Wheat, although the rates are hardly so high as on this day week. We quote good merchantable samples at 85c to 73c (3s 3d to 3s 7½) per bushel. For a choice lot 75c (3s 9d) might be realized.

The following will show the receipts of wheat for the week, and the amount in store at the wharves:—

Wheat.—In store last report, bushels	21,023
Received since,	15,650
	36,673
Shipped	370
At present in store	32,303

The above shipment is to Montreal.

FLOUR.—There is a new feature observable in the flour market. The feeling is far from buoyant, and although there is a moderate speculative inquiry on the lowest rates, yet the comparatively high price of wheat and the difficulty experienced in procuring money, depresses the flour market. There has been some few sales during the week, generally on Montreal account. Indeed, of the 16,500 barrels held in store, fully 10,000 have been bought, and are now held for Montreal dealers. The general quotations are unchanged. Superfine $3 50. Fancy $3 75 to $3 80. Extra $4, with occasional sales of favourite brands of the latter grade, at $4 10 to $4 20 per barrel.

Flour.—In store last report, barrels	11,030
Received since	5,893
	16,923
Shipped	325
At present in store	16,598

In Montreal the flour market has ruled steady throughout the week. The best brands of superfine from sound wheat are comparatively scarce. Several inferior lots have sold at $4 00 to $4 30. Fancy, $4 50 to $4 60. Extra neglected at $5 to $5 25. Double Extra wanted at $6 00.—Several lots of 1,000 barrels each have been sold for delivery in May and June, at $4 50. A lot of Upper Canada Spring wheat for May delivery at 95 cents per bushel.

BARLEY is not in much request, and prices have a downward tendency at 60c to 80c (2s 6d to 3s 6d) per bushel.

RYE is in poor supply, and without a very active demand; it quiet at 60c (2s 9d) per bushel.

OATS.—The supply of oats has somewhat fallen off, and prices are firmer at 30c to 32c (1s 6d to 1s 7d) per bushel, with some few sales at 33c (1s 8d.) Any increased supplies would speedily deaden the market.

PEAS are scarce, and but few transactions are noted during the week. Prices range from 60c 50c (2s to 2s 6d) per bushel. The Montreal papers notice sales of peas to the extent of 3,000 minots (4 over a bushel) at 90c (4s 6d) for shipment to England via Portland. The demand has now subsided.

PORK.—The market for dressed hogs is very active, principally owing to short supplies and an improved local demand. The wants of packers are well filled, and any purchases now made are for immediate consumption. The quality brought in by farmers is generally very good, and commands now from $5 to $5 50 per 100 lbs, with occasional sales at $5 75 and even $6. Very heavy hogs are not so saleable as those of medium weight. Bacon and other descriptions of cured are very quiet at quotations.

BUTTER.—Fresh is scarce and sells freely at 19c to 22c (11½d to 1s 1d). Tub is still plentiful at 13½c to 15 (7½d to 9d) per lb, according to quality.

CHEESE is unchanged. American is firm at $8½ to $11 per 100 lbs.

EGGS come in more freely and sell readily from farmers waggons at 16c to 18c (10d to 11d) per dozen.

POULTRY is very scarce, and any offering are readily bought up by hucksters. The current rates have been 45c to 75c (2s 3d to 3s 9d) per pair for chickens, and about the same rate each for geese. Turkeys are not plentiful at 85c to $1 25 (4s 3d to 6s 3d) each.

POTATOES are not plentiful, yet the demand is far from being as active as earlier. Sales of loads are reported at 55c to 60c (2s 9d to 3s.) Some choice varieties have realized 65c (3s 3d) per bushel.

APPLES are not so much in request, except when retailed by the peck and bushel. Good varieties when sold in this way realize 75c to $1 (3s 9d to 5s) per bushel. By the barrel they will not bring over $1 75 to $2.

HAY comes in very freely at $10 to $16 per ton. Straw $7 to $8 per ditto.

BEEF is not offered so freely. Slaughtered from farmers sleighs is sold at $5 75 for hind quarters,

The country would, we conceive, support the Government in any just interference for the suppression of such hideous plots as this which has just failed at Paris. We do not wish England to be made an asylum for the most cruel and dastardly assassins. But we are bound to say, that the language of the President of the Senate and other officials, in their congratulatory addresses, is not calculated to win favor for any overtures of the French Government. We can well imagine the indignation and horror with which all Paris regards the late deed, and can excuse any warmth of expression on the morrow of so heinous a crime. But the insinuations that England has erected itself as a citadel from which assassins may go forth, and the hope that now this country will not remain intrenched in its selfishness, but will unite with the Continental Powers to drive the democrats from Europe, constitute a style of language to which we could not be expected to respond amiably. But we would warn refugees of all sorts that they have no mercy to expect in this country if they be detected in a plot against a foreign government. They came here freely, they live here in security, and they may depart when and how they will. While here they have all the right of our own people, and no man can molest them. But if they attempt to pursue their bloody schemes on English ground they must prepare for the severest punishment which the laws of the land can inflict.

The Conspiracy Against Napoleon.

Paris, Wednesday, Jan. 27th, 1858.

The sensation created by the late attempt upon the life of the Emperor, is far from subsiding. New developments serve to show that the conspiracy was not an isolated one, or at least that the few individuals concerned in the attempt of the Rue Lepelletier, were not animated simply by personal passion in endeavouring to destroy the life of the Emperor. From England, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland, and Spain, we have evidence that many of the revolutionary refugees were awaiting the coup of Orsini and Pierri, in order to make an irruption into France, and to raise the standard of revolution in all the revolutionary States of Europe. The plan of the attempt, and its execution, were perhaps the work of these two desperate men; but the party to which they belong, in all its European ramifications, were apprised of the moment at which the attempt was to be made and were prepared to take advantage of its result.

It is reported that one of the prisoners, Rudio, has turned State's evidence, and that, in his confession, he has revealed a plot that does not offer a very smiling perspective for the Emperor. According to Rudio's confession, the conspirators were five hundred in number. They are bound to their work by a terrible oath, and their object is the assassination of Louis Napoleon. Each year, or oftener, if circumstances will warrant the attempt, the whole band are to draw lots from a box in which there will be five winning numbers. The five numbers drawing these are held to put in immediate execution an attempt upon the Emperor's life, which shall be approved by the whole society, and by those who are charged with its execution. The society has plenty of money for carrying out its designs.

Whether this confession of Rudio be true or not, it is evident that on all the frontiers of France the revolutionists were waiting the blow in order to enter the country and institute a new order of things. The execution of their sworn design is, therefore not abandoned; it is only adjourned. There are plenty of desperate men besides Orsini and Pierri in the revolutionary ranks—men who, like them, are willing to sacrifice themselves to what they deem a sort of martyrdom for the general good of Europe.

The trial of the conspirators will not take place, perhaps, for a month. If the affair were personal to the individuals arrested, there would be no delay; but the work of gathering evidence from foreign States will necessarily occupy some weeks. The greater part of this evidence will come from England, the late residence of the conspirators. The efforts of the English police have already led to valuable results in the discovery of papers, which establish important links in the chain of the conspiracy. From England, also, we receive a complete history of the antecedents of the principal prisoners. These histories are published in the English journals, and you will not fail to remark that the name of Miss Meriton White appears on the surface again in connection with this affair. In the Count Orsini's history of his life in the Austrian dungeons, which was published some time ago in London. Miss White's name appears as its translator from Italian into English, and as the author of its preface, which is a warm eulogy of the subject of the biography.

The two principal conspirators, Count Orsini and Colonel Pierri, have revealed very little in the various secret examinations to which they have been subjected by the magistrates. They profess not to know each other, and deny all participation in the affair. A considerable number of arrests have been made since the date of my last letter, and it is said that more bombs have been found. The attentions paid by the Police to foreigners are very embarrassing and many arrests have been made on the most frivolous grounds. The reproach addressed by the Emperor to the Prefect of Police, "That his Police were the worst in the world," since he could not find the conspirators when he knew that they were in Paris, has only served, of course, to make this already unscrupulous body still more unscrupulous and indiscriminating in its proceedings.

Emile de Girardin's wordy flourishes about a "Constitutional Opposition" and the "Empire with Liberty," could not have fallen more mal apropos; for directly upon the heels of this attempted new organization we have a demonstration from the Emperor to the effect that a curtailment of the present liberties (!) of the French people is essential to public order in France and to the general tranquility in Europe. We have reason to believe that before the late attempt, and at the very moment when M. Girardin was eliminating his new doctrine, the Emperor was deliberating upon new repressive measures, and that he was only waiting for an occasion to render their introduction easy. The occasion has presented itself in the late attempts on his life and the wheel is already in motion. After the suppression of La Spectateur and La Presse several other journals were informed that the same fate awaited them if they did not moderate their language for the future. The suppression of some foreign journals published in the French language was also demanded. A French provincial journal was "warned" for the following offence: The journal added, after its notice of the Emperor's speech on the occasion of the Legislative bodies, that, "according to the Agence Havas, (telegraph line,) the cheering which followed his Majesty's discourse was most enthusiastic." The Prefect's warning says that the offence was contained in the ambiguous manner in which the fact is recorded—"according to the telegraph"—when every one knows, says the Prefect, that the cheering must have been of the character indicated. Again: a professor in a literary institution, who had been heard to call in question the enthusiasm which was attributed to the Parisians in favour of His Majesty, was called before a country Prefect, the words were acknowledged, and he was discharged from his functions.

But the most serious blow upon the liberties of the French people is dealt by a decree from the Emperor in the Moniteur of this morning. This decree divides France into five military divisions, each of which is to be commanded by a Marshal of France, under the title of commandant Superieur. Marshal Magnan, it is supposed, will still retain command of what has heretofore been called the division of Paris and Marshal Count Castellane of the Lyons division. The other will be commanded by Marshals Pelissier, Canrobert, and Bosquet. The decree states that one of the objects of this new organization is to secure a greater facility in the suppression of troubles within the State, as each of these Marshal-Governors will have extended powers in his department. Thus is France not only a despotism; it has re edied into a military despotism, the most execrable of all; for the new organization of the Empire would of course be unmeaning if the military governors were prefects, sub-prefects and magistrates of their respective districts. And all this in the name of public order, progress, prosperity and civilization.

The Presents to the Princess Royal.

From the London Times.

Yesterday afternoon the representatives of the public were admitted to Buckingham Palace to see the magnificent collection of bridal gifts which have been presented to the Princess Royal by every member of the Royal family, by the most of the illustrious guests who have lately honoured her Majesty with a visit, and by some of the chief personages of the illustrious house with which she is now so happily connected.

The exhibition of wedding gifts on those occasions is generally made with some display of taste and skill in the combination of colors and general effect, so as at least to exhibit the objects fairly, if not to set them off to advantage. Under such circumstances, and with proper management, such displays are often very attractive; and with the intense interest which attaches to all relating to the Princess Royal, it would not be easy to render gifts to her other than deeply interesting. If anything, however, could have detracted from the effect, and even interest, of these magnificent cadeaux, it was the manner in which the functionaries connected with the Palace displayed them. We do not speak of the style in which they were put together on a table in a small billiard-room. It is quite possible that the arrangement might be a matter of taste; but it surprised us to find that many of the presents were left without anything to indicate the quarter from whence they came, and the only information beyond the name of the person who gave it, which it was in any case possible to obtain was the cost price of almost every article exhibited, and whether it was silver gilt, or only gilt on "metal." This ungracious knowledge, which is generally kept so carefully in the background when gifts are in the question, was, as we have said, almost the only kind obtainable beyond the actual sight of the anonymous articles to which it related. One functionary, however, possessed not even this limited information, though he knew the things "were very valuable as he was put there to prevent them being stolen." Most of the articles, however, were ticketed with the name of the illustrious individual from whom they came, so that a catalogue raisonnee could be formed which we append, only as a general rule withholding the price list. The most conspicuous among the brilliant mass was the present of the King and Queen of Prussia—a lofty open coronet of diamonds, the design of which, with its spires of brilliants and open shell work between, is probably one of the most chaste and graceful that has ever been executed. Equal with this are those given by her Majesty. The first is a broad diamond necklace, with a treble row of the most brilliant drops and long pointed terminals, which match the light tracery of the coronet. The second gift of the royal mother consists of three massive brooches, somewhat in the style and size of the Scotch plaid brooch, but which, having an open circlet in the middle, are in each case filled with a noble pearl of the largest size and purity of colour. The Prince Consort gives a superb bracelet of brilliants and emeralds, which is beautiful both in design and execution, and is altogether a most costly present. This has additional interest in the eyes of visitors from its being one of the bracelets which the young bride wore at the Royal Chapel on Monday last. That which she wore on the left arm was also a diamond and emerald bracelet, presented by the gentlemen of the Royal Household, but which, though a splendid present, and probably equal in value to the Prince's, is much inferior to it in design, and still more so in the manner in which it is set.

The gift of the Prince of Wales is in rich beauty of effect far superior to them all. It is a suite of ear-rings, brooch, and necklace of opals and diamonds; but the opals, in play of colour and irridescence, are superior to any we have yet seen, and the design of the settings is quite in keeping with the exquisite beauty of the stones they inclose. As we have said, in magnificent, and at the same time chaste effect, this gift surpasses all. But the present of the bridegroom is perhaps the most costly, though in appearance the most simple of any. It is a necklace of pearls, and our readers may easily judge of their value when we say that the necklace, though full-sized, only requires 36 to complete the entire circle, which graduates in size, from the centre tapering less and less in size of jewels as it approaches each end. The three centre pearls in this superb circlet are said to be of great value. The Queen gives a third present of three silver candelabra, which form the most regal looking group of silver we have ever seen. The centre piece springs from an elaborate base, and is surrounded by large groups of figures exquisitely chased in full relief. This supports between 20 and 30 branches, and is four feet high. The two others are to match the centre, and are equally elaborate and almost equally massive and lofty. There was no ticket to indicate whom this was given to; one of the authorities stating most positively that it was a present from the Queen to the bridegroom, while another asserted that it was presented to the bridegroom's father. As, however, the former statement seemed infinitely more probable, we must believe it to be the correct one. The Princess of Prussia gives a truly regal gift of a stomacher brooch of brilliants. The stones in this superb ornament are large and of the purest water, and the setting and design are exquisite. The Princess Alice gives a small, but beautifully formed brooch of pearls; and the Princesses Helena, Louisa, Victoria, give each a massive stud brooch or button, similar in shape to those in diamond and pearl of the Queen's gifts, which we have already mentioned. These brooches are of massive gold ornamented with pearls and emeralds, pearls and rubies and pearls and sapphires. The Duchess of Cambridge gives a noble bracelet of diamonds and opals, and the Princess Mary her portrait in massive gold frame and stand. One of the most beautiful of all, however, is the gift of the bride's royal father-in-law, the Prince of Prussia. It is a magnificent necklace, with pendants of exquisite design. It is composed of pure brilliants and turquoises, and is called, from the size, rarity, and value of the latter gems, the turquoise necklace.

The bride's grandmother, the venerable Duchess of Kent, gives a most magnificent and useful present. It is a large and most costly dressing case, containing sufficient articles to fit out the toilet-tables of a dozen ladies of quality, and all of which are of massive silver gilt, enriched with bright red coral. The simplicity and exquisite beauty of the designs for these things are not to be surpassed. Next, probably, to this in costliness, though infinitely reduced in regard to size, is the gift of the Maharajah Duleep Singh, which is one of the most fairy-like opera-glasses ever used by a lady. The design is elaborate—arabesques of gold on white enamel, with a double border and enrichment of diamonds. In a little card-box, with a delicate fringe left out to show the pattern, is the gift of his Majesty the King of the Belgians. It is a Brussels lace dress made expressly for the young bride, and our readers will be best able to judge of its exquisite beauty and carefully elaborated workmanship when we state that it is valued at no less than 50,000f., or £2,000 sterling. The Duchess of Saxe-Weimar gives a magnificent bracelet of rubies, diamonds and emeralds, and the Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Cobourg gave plain gold bracelets with enamel miniatures of the givers on each. Conspicuous among the piles of jewelry and plate is a characteristic gift; a large edition of the sacred volume—a Bible, bound in the most costly and gorgeous style. On the fly-leaf is inscribed:—

"The Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society to her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, on the occasion of her marriage, with sincere prayers to Almighty God for her happiness in time and in eternity.

"SHAFTSBURY, President.

"January, 1858."

There is also a writing-desk to match the dressing-case, and in which the contents are equally valuable and chaste. This is the gift of the Duchess of Buccleuch. The Marchioness of Breadalbane gives a toilet hand-mirror, with the frame of massive gold set with pearls, and the handle composed entirely of one brilliant cairngorm. Other things are there, too, which were rich and costly in the extreme, but none of them were ticketed, nor was it possible to ascertain from whom or whence they came. Of the little presents from the schools at Balmoral—the gifts of embroidery and Berlin work—the thousand nameless little tokens of affectionate remembrance which the young bride has received from all parts—not one was shown. The bad taste of such an exclusion needs no comment. It was, however, stated that all, even of what was costly, had not been displayed. This may very likely be the case, and may also account for the absence of any gifts from some of the late Royal guests.

Death of the Queen of Oude.

The Queen of Oude died at Paris on Sunday, the 24th instant, of grief and affliction. The Queen had only arrived in Paris on Thursday. The Overland Mail says, "The unfortunate lady left England a few days ago, in very bad health intending to proceed to Egypt, and eventually, we believe, to Mecca. She rallied slightly after her arrival at Paris, and hopes were confidently expressed that she would be able to proceed with her journey. But these good symptoms were delusive, and she breathe l her last on Sunday, we believe, in her fifty-fourth year. She was attended in her last moments by Dr. Royer, one of the Emperor's physicians. The prayers enjoin d by the Buddhist religion were said over her death-bed.

The funeral took place on Wednesday at Paris, and was conducted with extraordinary magnificence. The body was embalmed on Monday night, and for the purpose of the operation, according to the custom of the religion to which the deceased belonged, it was found necessary to construct a kind of wooden platform in the court yard of the hotel, whereby the body of the princess could undergo the process of thorough ablution. The features of the deceased were very little changed. No incisions were made for the operation of embalming as is usual in Europe; the people of the suite, who themselves effected the operation introduced aromatic substances and perfumes through the mouth, ears and nostrils, and repeatedly annointed the body with odoriferous oils and essences. The body was afterwards wrapped round with bands of fine muslin, and the whole covered with a crimson cloth embroidered in gold. After this had been done, the religious service commenced. The females, whether relatives of the deceased or ladies of the palace, and afterwards the officers and servants entered successively into the chamber where the body was laid out, and where two priests recited the prayers prescribed by the religion in which the princess had lived. The females uttered deep groans and the men showed every sign of grief. No light was burning in the room, but a fire was lighted in the court, which was, according to custom, to be kept burning until after the body had been removed. The hearse and mourning coaches arrived at the door of the Hotel Lafitte at 10 o'clock in the morning, but were sent away again, in consequence of the fire not having been burning long enough. The funeral procession was not formed till two o'clock.—The hearse, which was entirely covered with silver tissue, was drawn by six white horses. The chief mourner was the youngest son of the late Queen, Mirza Hasmet Lekendal Bahadar, who bears the title of General, and is a brother of the sovereign now confined in Calcutta. He is a man of about thirty years of age, of good height, and rather corpulent. He wore on his forehead a diadem ornamented with rubies, and was dressed in rich silk and velvet robes. This high personage arrived from London on Tuesday, and on presenting himself at the Hotel Lafitte all the officers and servants in the Queen's suite prostrated themselves before him. It is worthy of note that Mirza Bahadar, while following the coffin on foot, leant on the arm of General D'Orgoni. A very great crowd assembled in the Rue Lafitte to see the procession pass. When the body left the house a number of Indian women of extraordinary ugliness, but dressed in rich and picturesque costume, appeared weeping in the balcony; they were probably attendants on the late Queen. There were about a dozen natives who followed Mirza Bahadar as mourners on foot, and there was a line of ten mourning coaches all filled. The body was interred in the Mussulman Cemetery at Pere la Chaise. It appears that the deceased did not belong to the Buddhist religion, but was a Mahometan. Her name is inscribed on the register of deaths at the Mayoralty of the second arrondissement as "Malka Kaenwar, Queen of the kingdom of Oude; died Rue Lafitte, aged 52 years." A blank is left for the place of her birth, which none of her attendants were able to state.

Communications.

To the Editor of the Port Hope Atlas.

Sir,—Will you please inform the scribbler of that cabbage-leaf-sized paper called the "Guide," that if he thinks that he can turn the scale of the Branch against me he is quite at liberty to try it on. It seems he is going to open his budget next Tuesday, and let out some wonderful discoveries he has made. I wish you to call his attention to the following letter, and ask him what he has to say for himself on that account:—

28, Cliff Street,
New York, Feby. 10th 1858.

Henry Mason, Esq., Cobourg, C. W.,

Dear Sir,—I am again under the necessity of writing you in relation to a settlement for the railroad iron shipped to Port Hope. Mr. Conger arrived here last Friday, and waited for Mr. Smith, the President of the Company, until Saturday evening, when he left for Albany without making a final settlement with me. This morning I have a note from him stating he should leave for Montreal on his return home. He left with 16 Bonds of £500 each, but I have no notes. These he stated Mr. Smith would bring with him and the other portion of the securities.

Mr. Smith, however, does not make his appearance, nor have I the least intimation when he may be here. The whole thing appears to be neglect of the President of the Company, and I am quite at a loss to explain the cause of delay. I consider the conduct of the gentleman in charge of the road most strange and inexplicable. I learn from Mr. Conger that Mr. Fowler is most anxious to have the account closed. Perhaps you will see that gentleman, and explain my position to him, for really the delay is not only vexatious but of the most serious inconvenience, and unless I hear from the parties shortly I shall most certainly sell the Bonds I hold for their account and commence a suit for the balance. Please advise by telegraph what has been done, and oblige,

Yours, very truly,
SEPTS. CROOKS

As for Mr. James Smith, I wish to say a little to him on account of what he said to me in their office. His words were as follows: "Fowler, we have been through the mill once, and we have got our eyes open. Zimmerman has had us under his finger and thumb, and he has robbed us when we were looking at him."

Now, Mr. Smith, if Zimmerman has robbed you whose fault was it? He could not do it without the sanction of your engineer. And who was your engineer?—If I am not mistaken, it was T. C. Clarke your own brother-in-law. Now, I do not believe Zimmerman has been settled with yet, and I as a stockholder, call on you and the other Directors to have an investigation, and if you can prove that Zimmerman robbed you, well then make that firm refund, the same as Cobourg did. I do not believe you would have said to me that Zimmerman had robbed you if you were not prepared to prove it; and as you said contractors wanted watching now is your time to show the town something.

Now, Mr. Editor, I think we will let them slide this time, and see what disclosures they make on Tuesday.

Yours, truly,
JOHN FOWLER.

Legal Prohibition.

To the Editor of "The Examiner."

Sir,—Please insert the following Report, adopted by the Lodge at a regular meeting held February 16th, 1858, and oblige the members of Friendship Lodge No. 146 I. O. of G. T.

By order.

WM. KENNEDY,
W. Secretary.

Your Committee appointed to prepare a statement of the views of this Lodge in reference to a Prohibitory Liquor Enactment, present the following

REPORT:

That whereas certain statements have gone abroad having a tendency to cause a misunderstanding with regard to the principles and aim of the Independent Order of Good Templars, it becomes incumbent on this Lodge to emphatically state what its views are—with respect to that great question of the day,—the Legal Prohibition of the Liquor Traffic.

Resolved 1st,—That nothing short of a Law prohibiting the Manufacture and Sale of intoxicating liquors as beverage, would satisfy the members of our organization, believing that the baneful traffic can never be eradicated from our land by any other enactment.

Resolved 2nd,—That while we employ every constitutional means within our power for obtaining such a law, we maintain that unless we individually and collectively work for the advancement of the cause of total abstinence by moral suasion, we would fall far short of what a temperance organization should be, and in view of this fact, we use it as the great engine by which to secure all that we aim at, namely, the reformation of our fellow-men, and the total overthrow of every semblance of the traffic.

Railway Company of Port Hope.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

Sir,—A good deal of newspaper correspondence has recently taken place between myself and Messrs. Jno. Shuter and James Smith, respecting the Railway Company of Port Hope, which I dare say the people of Peterborough have seen and made their comments upon.

I have, however, a little more to say on the matters under discussion, and also take the opportunity of laying before my Peterborough friends an alteration about to take place in railroad affairs, which will prove highly advantageous to their interests, and to the speedy prosperity of the town and neighbourhood, in which I feel certain I will have their hearty co-operation and support.

I would first take occasion to remark that both the Messrs. Smith have expended a vast amount of virtuous and unnecessary indignation upon an humble individual like myself, and lawyer-like have raised special pleas and side issues quite wide of the real facts of the case and the main question involved; their whole statements from beginning to end are full of misrepresentation, garbling, and high coloring, with a grain of truth here and there mingled among the tortuous mass, but so well covered up that it is almost impossible to discover it.

I have good reason to complain of the manner in which the Messrs. Smith have treated me since I agreed to lease the Millbrook Branch and build it, and in the latter capacity I may here inform those gentlemen that it is with me alone they have to deal as contractor; a marked change took place in their conduct towards me from the moment that I resigned my interest on personal request in the Port Hope and Lindsay line. I am free to admit it did not take great pressing to induce me to withdraw as I never had much confidence in it, but be that as it may, a friend and connexion of their's stepped into my place, and from that time I was looked coldly upon and in the way, as one whom it was exceedingly desirable to get rid of by any means, fair or unfair; these gentlemen could not resist the ruling impulse of their nature, got power over others and show it at once, let this Contractor of ours see that we are masters and make him feel it, we will make him kiss the rod and bow down to me, or will annoy him and cramp him in every way we can, force him to do as we like, or throw up his Lease and Contract in disgust. I annexed to all Port Hope if this is not a true picture of these would-be dictators. Watch other men, indeed! all the town of Port Hope and township into the bargain, is insufficient to watch them, or to deliver them from their snares and foils.

But what are the facts as between these gentlemen and myself. I took the Contract for the Branch at the lowest figures known as yet in Canada, and engaged to complete the road from Millbrook to the boundary of the Corporation of Peterborough in one year from the signing of Lease and Contract. What have I done? In five months the road was so far completed as to be ready for opening. My own Engineer, who surveyed the road, located it, and who has never been off it for a day, made up a careful estimate of the whole work, shewing what it would take to complete it when the Spring opened, and place it in a condition to obtain a certificate from the Government Inspector. The sum not down as sufficient, and which I deem more than sufficient, is less than the amount named in the contract as a reservation and collateral security for the performance of the entire work; and this percentage be it remembered, is calculated not only on the work but on the Iron also. The Engineer deducts then, the sum estimated to finish, and the ten per cent, together £8,000, shewing £41,200 as that due to the Contractor on the first of February, including his own stock, and less whatever payments had been made up to that period by the Municipalities of Peterborough and Port Hope, both on work, iron and all other materials; this left a balance coming from Peterborough of about £4,000, and from Port Hope of £3,000, including provision for payment of iron.

On this state of matters, when I required every shilling that was due to me to pay for labour and right of way, I was met with Messrs. Jno. Shuter and James Smith informing me that there was nothing due me by their Engineer's account, and that I required watching. I would like any man placed in my position with heavy demands upon me for work done, and completed at a great sacrifice to me, and requiring the most persevering energy to accomplish it in order to meet the views and wishes of all interested in the undertaking—to be told there was nothing due to me when the Port Hope payment amounted to £5,000 on £10,000 stock, while my Engineer's statement retained 10 per cent in their hands on this stock, and shewed £3,000 due to me less the payment made. Is it any wonder, then I say, that I should turn from all these gentlemen in anger and disappointment, and retaliate upon them in return for such treatment? Sir, it is not the paltry and insignificant reasons assigned in these gentlemen's published letters that I attach importance to—it is being told nothing is due to me when my Contract, a nearly finished; it being met in this way as a return for my services in having the road ready for opening seven months in advance of my Contract. If I had misapplied the funds provided for the road, or had large orders for the work, their suspicions and their watchings might have had some shadow of grounds and given cause for expressing dissatisfaction, but no such charge has been made, nor can be made.

Paltry and insignificant as many of the allusions made by the Messrs. Smith are, I have good reason to complain of the, on account of the manner and the time in which they were forced upon me they were, however, only parts of the wire-pulling which were to produce more important results. At a time when I was justly entitled to every assistance and encouragement which Port Hope could give me through the Company and those connected with and under them, I was kept back in my work, detained, hindered and annoyed, by trifles which should never have existed, and having arisen could have been immediately removed had the Company so pleased, and by these and other causes of a similar nature, I have entailed losses to a very considerable amount, which in all fairness and equity I claim that Port Hope or the Company will reimburse me. Among the more prominent of these I may mention the delay in forwarding the iron chairs and spikes—the loss entailed on the settlement for the iron—solely caused by the delay, carelessness and indifference of issuing the Harbor Debentures, and thereby producing a double injury, in forcing the application of Government Debentures set aside for that purpose, having to be used for the payment of labour on the road. The iron used in the construction is of a better and heavier quality than required by the Contract, which was done for no other reason than to promote an early opening of the road, and with the view of pleasing all parties, but it is not reasonable that I should be allowed to be the sufferer on that account, nor that I should not be remunerated for holding some three-quarters of a mile of road over and above my Contract.

I have now to say to the people of Peterboro' that I have faithful done my part, and more than my part by them, and will continue to do, and give them every satisfaction in my power for the confidence they have reposed in me: their road is now ready for opening at any time when it suits Port Hope to provide the rolling stock and settle with me on fair and equitable terms—on their shoulders lies all the responsibility for what has taken place, and what may take place hereafter.

And now I have but little space and time to place before you the facts which this disagreement has already produced been myself, the Port Hope Co., and Messrs. John Shuter and Jas. Smith. It is this: A revival of that scheme which almost all of you in Peterboro desired to see carried out when the rival roads of Cobourg and Port Hope were first mooted before the public namely a road round the head of Rice Lake branching to both places. The Cobourg people are now satisfied that they have been in error and find too much to contend with in Rice Lake and an unfavourable grade, the one against nature the other contrary to the rules of science.—What they now propose is to abandon their road from Peterboro' East to the south shore of the Lake, and adopt a route branching off from their present road some two miles south of Cold Springs, proceeding through a valley in the plains to the head of Rice Lake, passing the saw mill there, and proceeding from thence to Bloomfield and Centreville, and continuing by Scoular's Mills, to intersect the Peterborough Branch at or near the boundary between Cavan and Monaghan.

I may say this scheme is matured, and in proof of it, the Surveyors will be at work immediately and the line completed by early Fall, the entire distance being only fifteen miles. The estrangement between Cobourg and Peterboro' by the plan entered into will be entirely removed, while a fair competition for a division of the trade of Peterboro' will exist between Cobourg and Port Hope, both possessing equal facilities and equal conveniences for carrying on the large and growing business of this back country.

The scheme cannot but enlist the strong sympathies of Peterboro', embracing as it does most favorable arrangements for her, with two open doors for the transaction of her business, while it concentrates the entire Railroad interests in her very midst, with one outlet over her own road branching at the boundary to two important Towns on Lake Ontario; while from Peterboro' it will cover the ground up to Perry's Mills and from thence to Chemong Lake in time to be followed by a connection with Omemee and finally to Lake Huron.

Nothing can give Peterboro' such an immediate impetus as this, it ought to reconcile all interests and to promote unity of action, good feeling and good will between the three Towns, which nothing can disturb, and where such oneness of opinion does exist, there can be little danger that every difficulty (should any exist,) will be easily overcome and removed by the parties interested.

It is sufficient for me to conclude by saying that I have faith in the plan about to be entered upon, the business capacity of Cobourg we well know; they are agreed, I am agreed to take the contract, and do the work, and see my way clearly how it is to be effected. It will certainly take place, and ought to have the hearty concurrence and good feelings of every well-wisher of the Town of Peterboro'.

For the present, Gentlemen,
I remain, your obliged Friend.
JOHN FOWLER.

Peterboro', Feb. 22, 1858.

Commercial.

Commercial Matters.

(From the Toronto Globe, February 18.)

We are glad to perceive that a very general movement is being made in getting out the produce of the country, and as far as practicable, realizing money thereon. The good sleighing enables farmers in all parts of the country to convey with ease heavy loads of wheat. The universal scarcity of money, and the probabilities of a continuance of low prices, compels them to the determination that it is as well and better to sell now, when the roads are good and they are not busy, than to wait till Spring when it will be difficult to get produce to market, and they will be crowded with the Spring work.—Certainly every day spent in bringing out produce will add another to the short causes in Spring, and inasmuch as the past year has shown that it is not a wise policy to trust all to the fall wheat crop, every day gained for Spring labor is worth a great deal. This consideration, if others of the paper weight were not evident, show it to be the wise policy of farmers to sell now.—There can be no doubt but this is the general conviction, and we feel assured it requires only a moderate and safe amount of accommodation for ninety or even sixty days on the part of the banks to get forward to the lake shore the great bulk of last year's crop; to be either sent forward immediately by rail, or to lay in store ready for early shipment in the Spring before the Canals are open, when stocks in the East are exhausted, and when prices will in all probability be better.

Among the manifold evils of our banking system made so painfully evident in the present depressed state of trade, there is none more glaring and unjust than that of favoritism to particular persons. It will be remembered that the Board of Trade, in its last annual report, made allusion to this abuse, and strongly condemned it, and now that there may be many applicants for discounts, we hope there will not be so much partiality. Such practices are wrong in themselves—wrong, because contrary to the spirit and objects of banks, their institutes and charters—and wrong, because like any other error, they grow, increase, and are aggravated by tolerance and use. The loanings of large sums to extensive speculators and pet customers prevents the distribution, in fair and equal proportions, to honest, industrious, and deserving persons, whose credit is equally as good for comparatively smaller amounts. The practice is in every way injurious. By limiting accommodations to a few, instead of distributing them generally, the capacity of the bank for doing good to the greatest number is circumscribed; that mutual and reciprocal dependency which should exist between bankers and merchants is violated, and the utility of the one, and the interest of the other, become seriously affected. The best customers of a bank judiciously managed are the whole solvent trading community, and not a few; for banks, as well as individuals, have their periods of trial and adversity, when they need the sympathies and good will of the entire public. A spirit of mutual kind feeling and reciprocity of action should be cultivated, as indispensable to the common interest. Banks and merchants live by each other; both exist together; and without mutuality of purpose, neither can prosper healthfully. The inherent errors of the banking system, as well as the pernicious practices which are incident to it, are the legitimate objects of legislation, and certainly some action is necessary. This, with other questions deeply affecting the commercial interests of the Province: should come up before Parliament, which assembles next week, and if nothing is done, at least some of the disabilities under which the trade of the country labors should be discussed.

The trade in merchandize, so far as the city is concerned, is without improvement, and indeed in any department we have no change to note. It is too soon yet to expect any revival in exception upon the movement in produce, but in the course of a fortnight the aspect of affairs may begin to brighten. It is expected that the remittances from country merchants will increase, and ease be thus imparted to the money market. On the whole, the week closes with a much better feeling in commercial circles.

We have another weeks' news from Europe, bringing interesting items of financial intelligence, all pointing to an abundance of money and increasing difficulties in its employment at even very low rates of interest. The Bank of England has reduced its rate of discount to 4 per cent, and a still further reduction is spoken of as necessary, applications for discounts having almost entirely ceased, while the bullion continues to accumulate. This is cheering news, but, on the other hand, the produce markets continue depressed, with lower rates, and with but poor prospects of improvement.

From the date of our last review until Tuesday, we were much disappointed in the supplies, and had began to fear that the advent of snow and excellent sleighing were not sufficient inducements to increase the number of sellers on the market. On Tuesday and Wednesday, however, there was a large turn out, and more produce changed hands in those two days than during any one week for the past three months. There appears to be a simultaneous movement all over the country, and wherever there is a market for wheat, the deliveries are increasing. Contrary to the expectations of many, farmers seem much inclined to accept the prices offering, and the more this disposition is evinced, the sooner may we expect easier terms. We are also glad to notice that the wheat recently brought out is of a much improved quality, and we have samples before us fully equal to the magnificent crop of 1855. On the whole, the week closes with a more cheering prospect, as far as the wheat trade is concerned. The supplies of other articles of produce do not increase in proportion, and prices for articles of family use continue high. There can be no doubt, however, that there are large quantities of produce in the country, and it is hoped that the comparatively good rates, the scarcity of money, and the pressure of debts, with the good roads, will soon cause a movement in other articles besides wheat. The demand for local consumption is active, and all the produce brought in is sure to find ready sale, although supplies increased to any large extent would depress prices. Our friends in the country must not therefore be disappointed if they do not realize many of the rates hereinafter quoted, as they are based on sales that have occured during the past week, and probably afford but a slender indication of the quotations current during the ensuing week.

WHEAT.—The deliveries of wheat on the market for the week ending Tuesday night, amount to 15,600 bushels, which shows a large increase on the receipts of any previous week since the middle of November. The price has also improved, ranging, as a general thing, from 85c to 95c (4s 3d to 4s 9d) for the best shipping wheat, and 70c to 80c (3s 6d to 4s) for inferior. On Tuesday, some few loads of very choice sample, realized one dollar per bushel, but these purchases were, of course, the exceptions. The average price for 5,000 bushels on Tuesday was not over 85c (4s 3d), notwithstanding the high outside figures; because a great bulk of the day's receipts was ready not worth more in proportion. Yesterday about 4,000 bushels were brought in but the market was hardly as buoyant, 85c (4s 6d) being the outside figure. Yet for the general sample, as good prices were realized.

The demand is very brisk, and competition more keen than for some time past. Excepting a few loads for local mills, the entire purchases have been made on speculation, equally for merchants in Toronto and in Montreal. Purchases are also being made in various parts of the country for this account, and we cannot but hope that the gentlemen who come forward so opportunely with their money, will be rewarded for their enterprize. They are men of large capital and have facilities for obtaining money not enjoyed by many.

SPRING WHEAT.—There is still an active inquiry for Spring Wheat, although the rates are hardly so high as on this day week. We quote good merchantable samples at 83c to 73c (3s 3d to 3s 7½) per bushel. For a choice lot 75c (3s 9d) might be realized.

The following will show the receipts of wheat for the week, and the amount in store at the wharves:—

Wheat.—In store last report, bushels	21,023
Received since,	15,650
	36,673
Shipped	370
At present in store	32,303

The above shipment is to Montreal.

FLOUR.—There is a new feature observable in the flour market. The feeling is far from buoyant, and although there is a moderate speculative inquiry on the lowest rates, yet the comparatively high price of wheat and the difficulty experienced in procuring money, depresses the flour market. There has been some few sales during the week, generally on Montreal account. Indeed, of the 16,500 barrels held in store, fully 10,000 have been bought, and are now held for Montreal dealers. The general quotations are unchanged. Superfine $3 50. Fancy $3 75 to $3 80. Extra $4, with occasional sales of favourite brands of the latter grade, at $4 10 to $4 20 per barrel.

Flour.—In store last report, barrels,	11,030
Received since,	5,893
	16,923
Shipped,	425
At present in store,	16,500

In Montreal the flour market has ruled steady throughout the week. The best brands of superfine from sound wheat are comparatively scarce. Several inferior lots have sold at $4 00 to $4 30. Fancy, $4 50 to $4 60. Extra neglected at $5 to $5 25. Double Extra stagnant at $6 00.—Several lots of 1,000 barrels each have been sold for delivery in May and June, at $4 50. A lot of Upper Canada Spring wheat for May delivery at 95 cents per bushel.

BARLEY is not so much in request, and prices have a downward tendency at 60c to 66c (2s 6d to 2s 9d) per bushel.

RYE is in poor supply, and without a very active demand; is quiet at 65c (2s) per bushel.

OATS.—The supply of oats has somewhat fallen off, and prices are firmer at 36c to 38c (1s 6d to 1s 7½) per bushel, with some few sales at 39c (1s 8d.) Any increased receipts would probably depress the market.

PEAS are scarce, and but few transactions are noted during the week. Prices range from 60c to 63c (2s 6d to 2s 7½d) per bushel. The Montreal papers notice sales of peas to the extent of 8,000 minots (1 minot over a bushel) at 90c (4s 0d) for shipment to England via Portland. The demand has now subsided.

PORK.—The market for dressed hogs is very active, principally owing to short supplies and an improved local demand. The wants of packers are well filled, and any purchases now made are for immediate consumption. The quality brought in by farmers is generally very good, and commands now from $5 to $5 50 per 100 lbs, with occasional sales at $5 75 and even $6. Very heavy hogs are not so saleable as those of medium weight. Bacon and other descriptions of cured are very quiet at quotations.

BUTTER.—Fresh is scarce and sells freely at 19c to 22c (1s 1½d to 1s 3d). Tub is still plentiful at 13c to 15 (7½d to 9d) per lb, according to quality.

CHEESE is unchanged. American is firm at $8 to $11 per 100 lbs.

POULTRY is very scarce, and any offering are readily bought up by hucksters. The current rates have been 25c to 75c (1s 3d to 3s 9d) per pair for chickens, and about the same rate each for geese. Turkeys are not plentiful at 85c to $1 25 (4s 3d to 6s 3d) each.

POTATOES are not plentiful, yet the demand is far from being as active as earlier. Sales of loads are reported at 55c to 60c (2s 9d to 3s.) Some choice varieties have realized 65c (3s 3d) per bushel.

APPLES are not so much in request, except when retailed by the peck and bushel. Good varieties when sold in this way realize 75c to $1 (3s 9d to 5s) per bushel. By the barrel they will not bring over $1 75 to $2.

HAY comes in very freely at $10 to $16 per ton. Straw $7 to $8 per ditto.

BILLINGS'

PATENT

ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

—:o:—

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, clean, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and bind it into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials, and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its Beauty.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices, Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its Durability.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its Cheapness.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICK

The "Leviathan" afloat at last.

LONDON SUNDAY EVENING

The metropolis below the bridge has forgotten, to-day, its usual strictness of Sunday observance, in its anxiety to see the monster ship take the water. The high wind of yesterday prevented Mr. Brunel from taking advantage of the spring tide. Captain Harrison, as the sun went down, wished for wind and rain enough to knock his hat in, and a storm of the desired pitilessness broke upon the metropolis in the night, and cleared the atmosphere exactly as the captain had foreseen. The wind fell, and a day of April warmth and brilliancy succeeded to welcome the Leviathan into her native element. It is impossible to describe the animation which prevailed in the region of Millwall and on the bosom of Father Thames this morning. Gangs of workmen were for the last time playing the hydraulic rams in the shipyard, and others covered the vast deck like a community of bees, as they were hauling in the hawsers and cables communicating with the steam tugs or fastened to the capstans ashore. A donkey engine on board the monster ship was letting off steam and pouring in cascades over the paddle wheels the thousands of tons of water which had been pumped on board by the river fire engine, to prevent the Leviathan from floating away in the night. The river was covered with innumerable two-oared boats, which were laden to the water's edge with reckless sightseers. Five tug steamers were at hand to tow the big ship from her cradle and were sailing round her as circumstances rendered necessary. The Greenwich and Woolwich boats, reaping a rich harvest; for, as the news spread, every boat up or down was densely crowded, and every available point on both sides the river, from which people on shore could see anything of the launch, was occupied. Flags waved from the taverns and ships, and the cheerful sound of church bells, and the occasional cheers of the crowd, would have led a stranger to suppose that some day of great festival rejoicing had arrived. The officials responsible for the launch would willingly have averted the seeming scandal, but they declared that if to-day's high tide had been allowed to pass, not only another month's delay might have been occasioned, but considerable injury might have been done to the hull in the interval.

About noon the men in the yard began to work the rams and at half-past one o'clock the Leviathan had been propelled along the rails no less than 80 inches.—During all this time the engine continued to discharge the water on board, and a little before two the monster craft began to show unmistakeable symptoms of liveliness at the stern. As her buoyancy became more marked the steamers in mid-stream pulled her broadside on towards the river. As she slowly sailed away from her shore cradle the workmen in the yard set up a hearty cheer, which was responded by those on board. Two steam tugs were then stationed at her bow, and took up the pulling, and the last chain cable that held her to the shore was let go with a noise that reverberated through the iron mass like thunder. An extraordinary spectacle was now afforded by the stern cradle, upon which half the ship's huge weight has so long rested.—These massive balks of timber were only kept together by the superincumbent mass, and when the Leviathan floated away from her cradle the huge timbers darted up about 20 feet above the surface of the water, in a perpendicular direction, falling about in alarming proximity to some of the pleasure boats; the cockneys in which might be pardoned if for a moment, they regarded them as sharks, or other monsters of the deep, springing out of the water at them.

The scene on board the Leviathan was exciting, and to strangers somewhat bewildering. Captain Harrison, who has been playing an amphibious part hitherto, as soon as the ship became lively in the water, took his speaking trumpet, and became thoroughly at home and in his element. Now he was at the bow telegraphing to the steam tugs or making the workmen haul in the cables with a will; anon he was amidships, calling for axes and sledge hammers, and directing men to cut ropes with their knives, or do anything else that a critical emergency invited. Mr. Brunel, who had now changed places with Captain Harrison, was also very busy on deck, giving orders to the shore people, and catching hold of a speaking trumpet—performances which he varied by occasionally tumbling over ropes, and having narrow escapes of precipitating himself into the ship's hold, or over the sides. The Marquis of Stafford, Mr. Henry Bentinck, M. P., with other noble lords and gentlemen, were on deck, in every body's way of course, but delighted to be on board during the launch. Mr. Howlett, the eminent photographer of Bond street, who has taken a variety of exquisite photographs of the Leviathan in all stages of her progress, and who has photographed the engineer, the ship builders, the directors, the visitors, Mr. Trotman, the celebrated inventor of anchors, the press, and everybody and everything connected with the ship, was on deck with his camera, giving the last finishing scene to his work, and taking Mr. Hope, the chairman of the company, in with a view of the deck.

The steamers and boats which covered the river, the marines who thronged together to see the launch from the Deptford dockyard wharves, the crowds everywhere observable in the streets and on the jetties, the music of the bells and the beautiful sunshine, the trampling of workmen fore and aft, the roaring noise of steam from the tugs, and the hoarse cries exchanged between the Leviathan, and her little satellites, made up an assemblage of sights and sounds which, considering that the day was Sunday, a man would scarcely wish to see and hear more than once in his life time; but which the necessity being conceded he would be sorry to have missed.

Slowly the gallant ship moved away down the river from the shipyard which has so long been impatient of her presence, and which was piled with timbers, the debris of the launch. "I wish," exclaimed Captain Harrison as she made her way, "I had her rudder up, that I might move her as I like. I am afraid of the paddle wheels coming in contact with the barges." In two minutes, the fear was shown to be well grounded. Two barges at the bows on the river side had been employed as a purchase to hold the chain cables which had afterwards been carried across the river and fastened to piles on the opposite shore; every contrivance had been employed to make these barges bear the immense strain upon them, and to prevent them from drifting away with the tide. The paddle wheel on the river side drifted against the first of these barges, and all attempts to extricate the wheel or remove the barge were useless. In vain the steam tugs pulled the ship ahead; in vain a tug attempted to draw the barges away. The moment was critical, for three o'clock had arrived, the tide was on the turn, and in a few minutes the monster ship might be drifting helplessly into the river broadside on, and swamping every craft between Millwall and London Bridge. Sledge-hammers were sent for; the sturdiest artisans hammered away at the iron paddle-wheels of the Leviathan without making the smallest impression. Again the tug slanted her position. The barges were immovable. "Axes," cried Captain Harrison, they were brought, and one of the barges was soon scuttled; another judicious tug from the little steamer and the paddle wheel cleared the remaining barge. A mighty shout from the boats and shore welcomed the victory, and again shout after shout rent the air as the mighty Leviathan, now fairly afloat, and clear of all obstacles, was towed to her moorings in the middle of the river. The Leviathan was launched at last, and the news, quickly circulating throughout the metropolis, has diffused as much joy as that of some great victory. The view of the monster ship in the water confirms the anticipations of those who declared that her bulk would never be properly realised until she was afloat among other craft,—the beauty of her lines, the sharpness of her bows, the amazing length of hull, which strikes the eye as it runs along it with a new sensation, the magnitude and solidity of her stern, will render her an object of admiration to the nautical man, and of ceaseless wonder to the public. She sits in the water as gracefully as a swan. Several months must yet be employed in fitting her out. It is probable that in the course of a few days the public will be admitted by tickets to inspect this wonder of the deep. It is also understood that the directors are going to Parliament for permission to issue preference shares.

Colonel Inglis, the Defender of Lucknow, India.

The mention of the name of this gallant commander of the garrison of Lucknow, when recently besieged by the rebels, calls to our mind something of his family history. Colonel Inglis, is the grandson of the Rev. Dr. Charles Inglis, who was the rector of Trinity church, New York, from 1777 to 1783. Upon the breaking out of the American Revolution he took sides with the crown, and was a violent tory during the whole contest. After Mr. Galloway turned traitor and went to England, Dr. Inglis was his regular correspondent, and his letters exhibit much bitterness against the leaders of the Revolution. Upon the conclusion of peace in 1783, being too much compromised to remain here, he left New York with the British army and went to Nova Scotia. He established himself in this province, and he was soon afterwards appointed Lord Bishop of the colony. He was the first Protestant bishop of any British colonial possession in either hemisphere. In the year 1809 he was appointed a member of the Provincial Council The State of New York confiscated the property of himself and his wife because of their adherence to the English government. He died in 1816, aged eighty-two years, in the fifty-eighth of his ministry, and the twenty-ninth of his consecration. Bishop Inglis, at his decease, left a son and daughter; the latter was named Anne, who married the Rev. Geo. Pidgeon, and died in Halifax in 1827, aged fifty-one years. The son was John Inglis, who, in 1825, was created Lord Bishop of Nova Scotia, and made a member of the Council, which position, we believe, he held to the day of his death, which took place a few years ago. In connection with his sacred office, we would mention that in 1826 Bishop Inglis confirmed four thousand three hundred and sixty-seven persons, and consecrated forty-four churches within his diocese. Colonel Inglis, of whom we write, and who is deservedly the hero of the garrison of Lucknow, is a son of the last-mentioned Bishop Inglis, but we are unable to say at what time he entered the British army, or give a further record of his military history. It is probably an excusable weakness that we should feel a degree of pride to record that this gallant officer is the grandson of an American. To judge him by his acts, the blood has not degenerated since his ancestors removed their allegiance from the revolted colonies.

Important Decision to Merchants and Clerks.

CIRCUIT COURT.
SATURDAY, 13th Feb., 1858.

Chadbonneau rs. Benjamin.—In this case the Plaintiff brought an action for one month's salary under a yearly engagement, accrued subsequent to his dismissal from Defendant's employ, prior to the termination of the engagement, alleging his dismissal to have been without sufficient cause. The defence was, that Plaintiff had absented himself without leave and otherwise infringed the rules of the establishment, and that Defendant was in consequence justified in dismissing him before the termination of the engagement.

The evidence proved that Plaintiff had sometimes absented himself for half an hour or more, without permission, and had otherwise infringed the rules of the establishment; and, on return of the Defendant from England, the latter, being aware of this had dismissed him.

His Honor, Mr. Justice Mondelet, maintained the defence and dismissed the action, alleging that he based his decision upon one fact alone, the Defendant absenting himself without leave, and that it was all important for the proper management of an establishment like that of the Defendant's, that the clerks should be punctual and attentive to their duties, and that it was well that clerks should know that they cannot enforce an engagement against their employers, if they are the first to violate it.

Mr. Morin, Attorney for Plaintiff, and Mr. Edward Carter, Attorney for the Defendant.

An Interesting Case.

A NOTE FOR $3,600 SWALLOWED BY A PHYSICIAN.

A case which has excited considerable talk in this city took place yesterday afternoon, the particulars of which are as follows. On the 13th of November last, Pierre Lucie Malo, a shaver of this city, who transacts business in St. Gabriel-street, discounted a note of five thousand six hundred dollars for Charles Sabourin, Esq., physician, of Longueuil, and ex-Mayor of that place. This note was endorsed by four parties, and was drawn in favor of Toussaint Daigneau of Longueuil. Yesterday, the 16th instant, this note became due, and Dr. Sabourin called at the office of Mr. Malo to take it up, and said he was unable to pay the whole amount of it, but would pay something on account, and give a renewal note for the balance. Mr. Malo then took the promissory note and placed it on a small table, whilst he was engaged in making a calculation of interest connected with the transaction; while so engaged, Dr. Sabourin quietly walked up to the table and seized hold of the note, tore it into small pieces, placed it in his mouth, and swallowed it. Mr. Malo then gave the alarm. Mr. Bedwell, a lawyer who has an office in the same building and on the same flat as Mr. Malo, in his affidavit stated that while sitting in his office he heard loud cries of alarm coming from the office of Mr. Malo. Mr. Bedwell then opened his door and saw Malo standing between the two doors, loudly calling for help, saying—"He has stolen my note; he has eaten my note for five thousand six hundred dollars; he has it in his belly." Mr. Bedwell then entered Malo's office, and there saw a stout man (Dr. Sabourin), who was then unknown to him, who appeared to be chewing something in his mouth, and making violent efforts to swallow, in which he succeeded. This man said a few words in French, to the effect that he did not owe Malo anything. The police were called in, and Dr. Sabourin placed in custody, and taken to the Police Court, whither he was followed by Malo, who was much excited and crying by turns, and exclaiming—"Doctor, vomit your innocence or guilt, I will give you some emetic;" to which Dr. Sabourin replied—"He was not going to make himself sick to please Mr. Malo." Dr. Sabourin has been under arrest ever since, and is now undergoing an examination before C. J. Coursol, Esq., Police Magistrate, on charge of felony. All the endorsers of the note have been summoned to give their evidence. The examination began this forenoon, and will occupy all day, and a portion of to-morrow. The above are, however, all the facts connected with the case which had been elicited up to two o'clock this afternoon.—Montreal Pilot.

A Duel Fought.

ESCAPE OF ONE OF THE DUELISTS—EXCITEMENT AMONG MEDICAL STUDENTS.

From the Philadelphia News, Feb. 13.

At twelve o'clock yesterday, a duel was fought between two medical students, on a level spot of ground, about one mile and a half from the Permanent Bridge, and a short distance to the rear of the Blockley Almshouse. The particulars of this bloody affair, so far as we have been able to learn, are as follows:—

A few evenings since, a number of medical students were in attendance at a social party given at the house of a friend, when one of them, Chas. De C——, one of the Sunny South, behaved rather insultingly to several of his fellow students, and threw a glass of old Otard over them, and some of which sprinkled the furniture. One of the students, R—— S——, threw a glass of hot water into the face of Chas. De C——, who became exceedingly indignant, vowed revenge, and demanded the satisfaction due to a gentleman. The parties met next day, and through the medium of friends, the arrangements were made, the weapons, single barrelled pistols chosen, and at eleven o'clock yesterday, the principals, seconds, surgeons, and a few other intimate friends, jumped into carriages and started for the place selected, where honor was to be healed by inflicting wounds in human bodies.

The Surgeons laid their instruments on a fallen tree, in sight of the combatants, and the seconds, Mr. E—— W——, and Mr. J—— H. C——, prepared the principals for the contest. Ten paces were measured off, and the principals being placed back to back, were to wheel and fire. Everything being in readiness, the words one—two—three—were given, and the next moment the sound of a pistol shot reverberated through the surrounding trees and hills, and R—— S—— staggered a moment, and giving one moan, fell backwards to the ground. His second hastened to him, and in staunching the purple tide of life as it poured out from the right breast of the fallen man, it completely saturated the linen cambric. Chas. De C——, the other principal, turned pale, he began to realise his situation, and observing a man in the distance with a significant star on his breast, picked up his coat and hat, and flew away upon the wings of fight, passed over Grey's Ferry Bridge, and the only thing heard of him up to dusk last evening was a small note found lying on the table in his room, containing the following, which we give verbatim:—

PHIL.—— Feb——'58.

Dear
J—— H. C——,

I am off for Europe, will remain in New York for a day or so—telegraph to me when he dies—come and bid me good-bye.
C—— De C——.

The letter, evidently written in a hurry, was directed to his friend and second. It is supposed that he started in the five o'clock line yesterday afternoon, for New York.

We may mention that the whole affair was a joke. The pistol of the fugitive principal was loaded with powder only, and that of the other with paper. The blood spoken of was obtained from a slaughter house privately, and the man with a star, who was seen approaching in the distance, was a fellow student. There were, perhaps, not less than forty witnesses present, who were stationed behind trees. The whole party was in the secret, excepting the absconded and affrighted Charles De C—— who has, perhaps, by this time, passed one sleepless night in the city of Gotham.

Capture of an American Slaver on the Coast of Africa.

From the London Times, Feb. 3.

"Since my last letter to you in August circumstances have happened of the most stirring kind. Never on this notorious coast has humanity been more outraged, or the energy and compassion of British seamen more called for or shown. We continued cruising, looking in at the different stations, until the 10th, when, at daylight, we saw a schooner at anchor. We made sail for her; she slipped her cable and ran along the beach. We followed her in the Sappho, as near as the depth of water would allow. The wind was light, so the commander took to the boats and soon came up with her; she proved to be a schooner of fully 150 tons, quite prepared for the reception of slaves, and had arrived the preceding day on the coast. The captain had landed—probably with the specie for the purchase of his cargo, as only 28 doubloons were found, rolled up in a man's garters, who looked foolish enough when the master-at-arms hauled them off. We took the schooner to Loando to land the slave crew, then finding her not seaworthy, we made a target of her to exercise our men and burned her. This gave us something to talk about until we returned to Loando on the 15th; there we found the Castor, with the Admiral on board, from the Cape; he sailed from Shark's Point, where the ships were collected for Courts-martial. We left the following day; at 9 in the morning on the 18th, in a thick mist with rain, we closed with a schooner; while boarding her the weather cleared, and a large ship was seen close to the land. Directly our boats returned we made all sail in chase, the ship making all sail to avoid us, and the chase became very exciting. The captain said we were gaining, and so they must have thought on board the ship, as he tacked in shore and we after him; then he bore away running along the edge of the surf, and by the help of his large sails was drawing ahead. By this time we were sure he was one of the large American slave ships, and we feared he would escape if he got sea room, so the captain took a boat well manned and armed and pulled to the windward to cut him off, when he would be obliged to take off shore; another boat was sent to the leeward, the master, the only officer on board, being left in charge. The ship was not more than a mile and a half distant, close to the surf. Seeing the trap laid for him, and that he could not escape, he ran his ship ashore. We anchored in four fathoms; the master took the whale boat close to the ship, and was soon joined by the other boats. The ship was rolling in the breakers with all her sails flapping about, and appeared to be full of slaves; the master and crew had abandoned her with their boats, leaving the American colours flying. Then we all beheld a dreadful scene; the slaves forced their way from below, jumped overboard, and soon disappeared in the rollers; it was terrible to see them. Our officers and men, regardless of their own lives, pulled through the surf to the leeward of the ship, but her heavy lurching for some time prevented their boarding; when they succeeded the scene was horrifying, the slaves still forcing their way up from the slave decks with loud yells, running to and fro, and continuing to throw themselves overboard. All attempts to pacify them were useless, force was necessary to drive them below until preparations could be made for their safety. We are told by one of the slaves who could speak Portuguese, that they were told the English would cut all their throats. As soon as the boats could be attended to the cutter was backed under the stern and a [illegible] thrown her; then three of the slaves were permitted up at a time and lowered into a boat, the whale boat conveying them through the rollers to the large boat, and so on to the Sappho; this continued until 8 p. m. The surf increased, and it was impossible to save more that night. One hundred and eighty were rescued. The master was left with a guard on board. It was an anxious and sleepless night for all, as death was rapidly decreasing the number of the poor negroes, who, starving and naked, died from utter misery,—men, women, boys and girls, more than 200 on board the Sappho, and as they ceased to breathe, we were obliged to throw them overboard. Poor negroes! I hope conscious in their last moments that English seamen came to save them and now made a silent prayer over them. Fortunately, we had plenty of rice from the schooner captured, which we fed them with, and placed them as best we could under cover of sails. As food and warmth restored them, in various ways they signified their sense of kindness. There was one poor creature, with an infant at her breast, naked, cold, and exhausted, apparently dying; and a little the wine was given her, then some rice, which she forced from her own to her baby's mouth. A shout was given to cover her; she wrapped her baby in it, and pressed it to her heart with that look of maternal love which God has given to the dark as well as the paleface race. On board the schooner the master and guard were with the remaining negroes in a perilous state; the former passed the night in the forecastle and bowsprit, drenched by the spray of the heavy rollers. At dawn on the 18th, the wind and surf had increased; the ship had driven closer to the beach; numbers of armed people were collected; a signal for assistance was made; the captain went with all the boats manned and armed, when the natives on the beach, led on by the white men apparently the crew of the ship, commenced firing with the intention of preventing the rescue of any more negroes. This continued an hour before we could clear the beach, some of our shots apparently telling well. On again boarding the wreck she was found breaking up, with her hold full of water. On the tide receding, her hull was nearly dry, and there was no time to spare. The large boats were stationed to keep the beach clear with their guns; the cutter was anchored at the back of the surf, and by watching the rollers they succeeded in throwing her a rope, when the negroes were lowered and hauled through the surf, and conveyed as before to the Sappho, 200 more being rescued; then the wreck was set fire to and our people withdrawn.

We were in such a state, with 380 negroes crowding our decks, the stench was putrifying, and it was impossible to work the ship. In this state the second day closed upon us. We were 40 miles off Shark's Point; the Captain resolved to go in his boat and ask for assistance. They pulled all night in heavy rain and at daylight on the 20th fortunately met the Vesuvius. Commodore Wise took the negroes on the Vesuvius, to be sent to Sierra Leone in the Alector prize. Having the slaves on board has caused much sickness; it is passing without any fatal case. We are ordered to the Cape, we suppose to cruise in the Mozambique Channel; if so, it is probable our bones will be left there; its effects, after what we have been through for twenty months on this coast will be finishing.

I have given you the history of one of the many American ships employed in the Slave trade; six, I think, have been taken. We seized the Pantata 30 miles up the coast, and sent her to New York; we do not know whether the American Government will condemn her.

Executions at Delhi.

At Delhi the course of justice no longer suffers any impediment, so far as the minor agents in the rebellion are concerned. On the 22nd of December the Nawab of Jheyghur was hanged. At an early hour the Chaudney Chowk, where the gibbets were erected, was thronged with natives, principally Hindoos, who appeared to take a lively interest in the spectacle. A strong body of her Majesty's 60 Rifles, preceded by their band, marched up about a quarter past four, and drew across the road on all sides of the gibbets, while the gallant Ghoorkhas lined the right side. All the buildings in the neighborhood were crowded with European spectators, some females appeared here and there. About twenty minutes past four the cart containing the prisoner appeared, drawn by bullocks, and guarded by a party of Sikh cavalry. The Nawab, a tall, stout, good looking man, dressed in plain white clothes, with a figured muslin turban, having been pinioned, mounted the platform; his eyes were covered with a cloth, and the hangman having descended the drop fell; and the traitor was launched into eternity. He struggled for some seconds and then all was over. The crowd was very orderly; not a sign escaped them during the ceremony, but very few Mahommedans were present. On the morning of the 24th three rebels were hung, one of them the leader of the attack at the Hindun and the plunderer of Goorgaon. His rank in the rebel army was 'General.' The other two were 'small fry.'—Daily News.

The Times has a letter from its Bombay correspondent, but it cont ins little in addition to what appears elsewhere. We extract some passages:—

"The only news from Rohilcund is that the Bareilly insurgents, or a part of them, who have been long looking greedily at the hill station of Nynee Tal, without daring to repeat their attack of September last, assaulted with success, an outpost of Cavalry, on the 8th of December. The post was, however, re-occupied by a party of Ghoorkas and Irregulars, and of the former troops a large body was expected at Nynee, when it was hoped that offensive operations might be undertaken.

"At Delhi the rebel Nawab of Jhujhur, after undergoing a protracted trial, was hanged on the evening of the 23rd December. He met his doom with the calmness of a Mussulman fatalist, and the great crowd that was present (containing, however, very few mahomedans) was perfectly silent. A brigade of the 60th Rifles and Ghoorkas kept the ground. The grandfather of the criminal received a grant of this jaghire of Jhujhur from Lord Lake as a recompense for his services to the British. The treason of his grandson has cost him his territory and his life. His treasure, said to amount to nine lacs of rupees, is of course confiscated to the state.

Execution of a Man and Woman at Pittsburg.

The Pittsburg (Pa.) Chronicle of Friday, Feb. 12th, gives the particulars of the execution by hanging of Charlotte Jones and Henry Fife, for murder. The Chronicle says:—

"The scene on the scaffold was painful beyond comprehension, and drew tears from many of the spectators. Charlotte and Fife were attended, the first by the Rev. J. G. Brown, and the latter by the Revs. Mr. Bell and Mr. Williamson. They had religious services in the cell till within a few minutes before their removal to the scaffold. Shortly before two o'clock they left their cell, and taking seats, a procession was formed.

"After entering the yard the party ascended the scaffold, and took their seats on chairs, which had been provided for their accommodation. A beautiful and effective prayer was then made by the Rev. Mr. Brown, after which each made statements. Fife read his statement in a clear, audible voice. During its delivery he seemed greatly affected, and frequently burst into tears. Charlotte's statement was read by Mr. Williamson, a gentleman who took much interest in the unfortunate woman's spiritual welfare. Mr. W. is an Englishman by birth, and a member of the Episcopal Church.

"Immediately after Mr. Williamson ceased reading, the Rev. Mr. Bell read a chapter from the Bible and offered up a prayer, in which the prisoners joined. Fife, during this trying scene, maintained the most astonishing composure, and when the time came, actually adjusted the rope around his own neck and stamped on the platform, as if to say that he was prepared to meet his fate. Charlotte, on the other hand, seemed utterly broken down and bewildered. She cried bitterly, and every now and then uttered incoherent sentences—now stating that she desired to die, and again declaring that she was afraid of death and wished to live. Fife, seeing her agony of soul and utter prostration, put his arm around her, and endeavoured in every way to console and cheer her. Such was the state of mind of both and such their condition, when it was announced that their hour had arrived, and that they must now prepare for execution.

THE EXECUTION.

"Everything was now ready for the completion of the final act of the bloody tragedy, in which the convicts had played such a terrible part. The ropes had been adjusted around the necks of the victims, and but a few moments were to elapse ere their souls would be ushered into eternity. Still Fife's coolness forsook him not. He called each of them around him as he knew on the scaffold, and shook them affectionately by the hands. He then declared that, "with the help of God he would die like a man," and with a firm voice, in which the slightest tremor was not discernible, exclaimed, "Remember I die game." He then turned to his companion in guilt, who at this time was scarcely conscious, and putting his arm around her, kissed her. Both then declared themselves ready to die, and the signal being given, the sheriff touched the spring, and the souls of the guilty couple were launched into eternity. Fife fell straight down and died without a struggle; but Charlotte's death was less easy, and fully ten minutes elapsed ere the pulsations of her heart ceased. Fife's heart ceased to beat within five minutes from the time the drop fell.

"Fife's appearance on the gallows differed but little from that which he presented while in prison. He wore the same clothes as usual, but appeared dressed with greater care. Charlotte was attired in her ordinary clothing, and wore over all a buff colored shroud. She seemed haggered and pale, and looked the very personification of misery.

"The bodies were allowed to hang some twenty-five minutes, after which, it being evident that life was extinct, they were cut down and placed in two coffins provided for the purpose. Charlotte requested that they might be buried in one coffin, but as this could not be conveniently done, her request was not complied with.

"The number present at the execution was about thirty, including the jury, sheriffs, officers, and two physicians. Outside the walls of the jail full fifteen thousand people were at one time congregated, while Boyd's hill, from which an indistinct view of the scaffold was had, was black with people."

Important Victories of Colonel Seaton.

"Our latest advices from the north-west are dated Agra, the 26th inst., from which we learn that Colonel Seaton's column, which marched from Allyghur on the 13th, en route from Eta and Mynpoorie, fell in with a force of the rebels, 3,000 strong, at Gungeree on the morning of the 14th.—Their surprise was complete, and after a brilliant charge of the Carabineers, the enemy fled in disorder along the Futteghur road, leaving several guns behind them.—They were hotly pursued for some distance by this corps and Hodson's Sikh horse, their loss amounting to 350 or 400 men. The casualties on our side amount to 43 killed and wounded. Our loss arose from the unfavourable nature of the ground, covered with thick and high bushes, in which the murderers enscouced themselves, and from their hiding places fired at our officers and men. Next day the column marched to Khasguage, but the enemy had fled, and it was said was posted at Sahawar, a village ten miles distant, on the road to Futteghur. On the 16th the column reached Sahawar, only, however, to find that the enemy had continued his flight. Some seventy insurgents, who were not quick enough in their flight, were cut up by Hodsons horse. Colonel Seaton then determined to follow them to Futtealee, ten miles farther. Although his information of the movements of the enemy was never to be relied on, still he knew they had a number of guns, and the heavy, sandy nature of the roads led him to conclude that they could not march so rapidly. On the morning of the 17th the advanced guard came upon the enemy, drawn up in position in front of the village of Futtealee. Their position, which was well chosen, was reconnoitred personally by Captain Hodson and Lieutenant Greathed, of the Engineers. Their centre and left were posted behind some ugly ravines, and their right rested in a tope of trees in front of the village. Colonel Seaton made his dispositions immediately, bringing the main body in order to give the men a short time for rest and refreshment. The light artillery went to the front, and the action commenced with a pretty sharp fire on both sides which disclosed better the position of the enemy and the number of his guns. Colonel Seaton then ordered the cavalry to the right, to avoid the ravines, and take the enemy in flank. While these operations were being carried out, our main body, advancing in battle array, deployed into line from quarter distance columns.—As the infantry, under Major Eld, came in sight, the artillery firing on both sides had reached its hottest point.

"At the first flash of the advancing bayonet, gleaming in the morning sun, the enemy fled en masse, while the rapid and precise fire of our artillery told with terrible effect upon his ranks. The cavalry had now cleared the ravines in front of the position, and went in close pursuit of the fugitives for seven miles. Their camp equipage, guns (thirteen in number,) baggage, ammunition, and stores fell into our hands, while it is supposed that no fewer than 600 of them were killed upon the field or in the pursuit. Not the least gratifying feature of the success is the small amount of cost at which it was purchased, not a single European having fallen on our side, and but three or four being wounded, and that only slightly. One of Hodson's horse was killed.

"The little force which has achieved this brilliant and decisive success, under its gallant leader Col. Seaton, started from Delhi about a month ago, and was composed as follows:

"Europeans: One troop of Horse Artillery; one squadron 6th Carabineers; 300 bayonets 1st Bengal Fusileers; six rank and file 9th Royal Lancers.

"Natives: Hodson's Sikh Horse; 7th Punjaub Infantry; two companies of Sappers and Miners.

This important success, in connection with the decisive victory gained by Sir Colin Campbell at Cawnpore a few days previously, must render the Dooab no longer safe for the fugitives, as the whole extent of country between that city and Agra will now be swept by the combined forces."

The correspondent of the Daily News, writing on the same subject, says:

"The action of Putteealee was fought by Colonel Seaton with the loss only of two men, whilst the enemy received such a severe handling as he would be likely to remember for many a day. The force followed the rebels from Gungeree step by step till eight o'clock on the morning of the 17th, when they were discovered in position west of the town, with at least seven guns drawn up in line. With these they opened fire long before our force got within range; our artillery went at once to the front, and fairly sounded them out of their ground in less than an hour; and the line then advanced slowly, but never came into action, the guns having done it all. They got seven guns in position, and our cavalry following them up sharp, caught them fairly off on the other side of Furruckabau, I suppose, and stopped the passage of 500 or 600 in a run of some five miles, taken seven more guns, three elephants, and no end of ammunition and plunder of all kinds. On one elephant was a silver howdah with the enemy's commander seated thereon: he was called Bukeers of Mhow; he, with a young Nawab by his side (name unknown) was slain as he sat."

Colonel Seaton in the meantime has attacked the town of Putteealee with his infantry, and killed between 500 and 600 Pandy infantry. Their cavalry, as usual, were off at the first shot, although about 1500 in number. From Putteealee, the force moved down towards Mynpoorie, and met the enemy behind some high trees west of this place on the morning of the 24th. 'He opened,' says the Colonel, 'with four guns, as I advanced. I sent the Horse Artillery guns a detour to the right, supported by cavalry; the heavy guns and infantry following. The enemy finding his retreat to the city cut off, soon began to retreat. We took all his six guns, and cut up 250 men.'"

France.

PARIS, January 27.

More than ever people are becoming anxious here as to what will be the form of the repressive laws adopted, and it is by no means a generally received opinion that the Emperor will at once see the necessity of moderation and the ill-advisedness of severity. Still, I, for my own part, maintain my first belief, that we shall see no more violent measures at all events for the present.

I had not yet spoken to you of the report of the Emperor having been attacked again since the night of the 14th, because I, at first, attached no sort of credence to the story; but I hear it now from such a trustworthy, and I might indeed say official, quarter, that I cannot avoid referring to it. It would seem that, on Sunday last, (the 24th) at the moment when the Emperor, on horseback, escorted by two attendants, was turning from the Champs Elysees into the Bois de Bologne, a man dressed in a blouse sprung forward for the following:—When the Prefect of Police, this same M. Pietri, tried to get Orsini into the explanation of the crime, (Orsini having confessed only his own individual share of it), he at one moment addressed the prisoner thus:—"But it is inconceivable to me how you, who have had the reputation of a man of courage and generous feeling, could have contemplated the murder of so many innocent people."—To this the answer was:—"It is now upwards of a week since I have been trying every means in my power, to make only two victims—myself and him—and I did not succeed."

I imagine the Government will find means to prevent young Charles Hugo's candidature for the deputation, and even to prevent his arrival here. His family (some members of which are here) say that he will find it impossible to enter France. This, I think, is likely, for his election would be a severe blow to the Imperialists, and it seems it would be sure to succeed, and that he would be elected enthusiastically.

One of the great preoccupations of the government is the book written by M. Charras, upon the "Military History of the Hundred Days," and which it has succeeded in keeping as yet entirely out of France.—The book passes those who have read it for an extremely clever one, and M. Thiers, who has managed to study it, says it will oblige him to re-write many parts of his "Cent Jours." Colonel Charras's text is this:—"The world is astonished that Napoleon, whose army was always victorious in the early years of his power, was the reverse after a certain lapse of time, and suffered defeat in Spain, in Russia, in Germany, and at Waterloo. The reason is simply that the two armies are not the same. The first was the produce of the free French nation, and was composed of brave patriots, every man of whom was a hero. The second was the army produced by despotism, and was an army of executioners." This is the theme developed (and it may seem victoriously so) by M. Charras, and you may easily conceive the anger of the Tuileries, on reading the book in question. The Emperor is all the more furious at what I have stated above, because the same argument has often been employed in his own case. It is said, with some reason, that the army in the Crimea was no imperialist army, but that created by the free constitutional institutions of France, under the house of Orleans; and it is now generally predicted that in a very few years more the "grande armee," created by Napoleon III. will be merely composed of carpet officers and mercenaries, who, in the end, will be found good only for the purpose of "keeping the people under." This has long been said, and what is passing just now shows it more and more evidently, but it is, therefore, all the easier to conceive how unwelcome must be to the Bonapartists such a work as that written by M. Charras.

Festivities in Prussia.

The Berlin correspondent of the Morning Post says that "Monday, the 8th Feb. is now definitely fixed for the grand ceremony of the "Einholung" (the bringing in) of his Royal Highness Prince Frederick and his royal bride to the Prussian capital. The preparations for that day, and for the ensuing fetes, are upon a scale of unprecedented magnificence. Crowds of provincials and foreigners are arriving hourly, and the prices demanded for lodgings and places to view the grand procession are fabulously high. Fifty dollars, (£7 10s.) was the cash some days back of a small window looking on to the famous "Unter-den-Linden" street and "Kloderadatsch." The Charivari or Punch, of Berlin, asks how much money people are prepared to "throw out of the window" on the approaching occasion. Our facetious friend who gives the following flattering description of British beauty, as from "Our London Correspondent":—

"You will presently have the pleasure of seeing flocks of Albion's sons and daughters on the Spree. I wonder that our dear Berlin ladies should be so sensitive as to feel annoyed at the remarks of the Times' correspondent respecting their deficiency in personal beauty. Each nation thinks itself the handsomest in the world. We paint the devil black; the blacks will have him white. Miss Pastrana delights in her beard, and every Englishman thinks his red-haired, crooked-nosed, rabbit toothed, goggle-eyed, loose-legged, callless existence, the very perfection of human beauty."

The Publicist states that of all the trades' companies which will take part in the festal procession of Feb. 8, the chimney sweepers will be the most numerous; they are to consist of 24 masters and 42 journeymen. The master will appear in black body coat, black cravat, waistcoat, and trousers, the journeymen in new suits of working clothes, with the implements they use in cleaning the chimneys on their shoulders; 12 apprentices in new working clothes, and provided with brush and ladder, will also be of the party, and the whole procession will be preceded by a band of orphan boys, which has been engaged at the expense of 70 thalers. The furriers will all appear fur clad, the marshals of the trade company distinguished by lappels and wristbands of ermine. The turners will carry an enormous chessboard, manufactured with unusual skill, as the emblem of their trade. The joiners have got up a banner, made entirely of wood, but which is described as very ingeniously put together; the weight, however, is very considerable and will require special contrivances for carrying it.

In almost every large town in Prussia the authorities have celebrated the royal marriage in one way or another—in some cases by dinners of the upper classes, in others by treats to the poor, the inmates of hospitals or prisons, &c., with the accompaniment here and there of illuminations.

Arrival of the Africa.

NEW YORK, Feb. 22.

The Africa from Liverpool, Saturday, the 6th instant, arrived on Sunday morning the 21st instant.

The British Parliament re-assembled on the 4th February.

In the House of Lords a bill for amendment of the law of libel was read a first time. One of the clauses gives a defence to all actions for faithful accounts of public meetings.

A general debate then took place, in the course of which Lord Derby, after referring to the still threatening state of affairs in India, spoke at some length upon the recent attempt on the life of Napoleon, and hoped the Government would take early steps for disabusing the minds of the French people as to the refugees in England.

Lord Panmure said that recruiting was progressing very favourably, and that troops were sent to India at the rate of one thousand a month. Also, that instructions have been sent to the Colonies authorizing the enlistment of all British born subjects who might volunteer.

In the House of Commons, Lord Palmerston gave notice of his intention to move a vote of thanks to the army in India; and also that it was his intention, on the 8th, to ask leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to conspiracies to commit murder. This is the measure to meet the refugee question.

A motion for a special committee to inquire into the transmission of troops to India was agreed to.

A congratulatory address to the Queen, on the marriage of the Princess Royal, was voted unanimously.

A bill was read a first time for abolishing imprisonment for debt &c.

A resolution was adopted conferring a pension of £1000 a year each on the widow of the late Sir H. Havelock and the present Baronet.

After some discussion, leave was given to bring in a bill to allow the East India Company to raise money in England on debentures. The power to continue in force until the end of the session of 1859, and the amount to be restricted to ten millions pounds.

Lord Palmerston gave notice that on the 12th instant he would move for leave to bring in a bill to amend the government of India.

CHINA.

The Paris Pays of the 5th instant gives some clue to the operations in China. As it is likely that Yeh may conceal the fall of Canton from the Emperor, Admiral Seymour proposes, in case of its capture proceeding to erect on the southern viceroy, to take Tiensing, a short distance from Pekin, which draws all its provisions from it. Thus, the Brother of the Sun could no longer plead ignorance of what the other barbarians are doing.

It appears probable that Prussia will have to range herself with France and England in operations to reduce the Chinese to civilized usages. Prussia is bound by treaty to protect ships under the Oldenburg flag to some extent, as well as those under our own.

An Oldenburg vessel has been wrecked on the coast of China, and the crew plundered and ill-treated.

The Oldenburg Government has just called on Prussia to carry out the treaty, and demand reparation from the barbarians.

Prince and Princess Frederick William of Prussia landed at Antwerp on the 3rd inst., and reached Cologne on the following day. They were received with enthusiasm at all points.

The bank of Prussia had reduced its rate of discount to 4 per cent.

The money market continues easier.

The Bank of England further reduced its rate of discount from 4 to 3½ per cent.—This announcement caused a slight rise in the funds.

It was said that the city of Paris was about to raise a sum equal to twenty millions dollars.

Subscriptions were invited for £1,161,600 at 6 per cent., debentures of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, and the whole amount was taken during the day at 97.

The Paris Moniteur publishes a decree which invests Prince Jerome Napoleon, uncle of the Emperor, with the right of attending the meeting of the Council of State and presiding over the same in the absence of the Emperor.

Feruk Khan, the Persian Ambassador, has ordered from a Paris manufacturer an apparatus necessary for establishing an electric telegraph in Persia.

After a succession of actions which lasted from the 7th to 14th of Dec., Schamyl was obliged to defer to the desire of the whole population of the great Tcherchez, and give in his submit to Russia.

The Viceroy of Egypt has, it appears, positively discarded in a very decided and tangible way, le project magnifique of M. Lesseps; so that the ingenious projectors of the Suez ship canal must henceforth trust to their own sources to make the desert bloom like a garden.

Said Pasha is at length fully awakened to the conviction that his own railway connecting this fine natural port of Alexandria with Suez, and the port of Ahaka, in the Gulf of Suez, is a far more magnificent project.

Weather very cold in France and Prussia.

London, Friday, Feb. 5.

Money very abundant. The Bank of England yesterday reduced their medium rate of discount to 3½ per cent.

The Prince and Princess of Prussia left Buckingham palace at a quarter to twelve on the 2nd. About eleven o'clock a detachment of Life Guards and of household troops drew up on the esplanade in front of Buckingham Palace, the band of the former playing "Home, Sweet Home!" At ten minutes to twelve o'clock the advance of an outrider and two orderlies told that the leave taking of the Sovereign and her daughter was over, and a moment after the royal cavalcade passed through the principal entrance gate. Her Majesty watched the departure from a balcony, and showed deep emotion. Immediately behind the orderlies came a squadron of Life Guards, and after this an open carriage containing, on one side, the Princess Royal and her august husband, and on the other, the Prince Consort and the Prince of Wales; this carriage being followed by one containing the Duke of Cambridge and Prince Arthur; and this again by several others, containing a few members of the Queen's household, and the suite of the Prince and Princess Frederick William. Behind the carriage occupied by the Royal couple rode a standard bearer and a second squadron of Life Guards. The procession started amidst a slight fall of snow, which gradually increased as it proceeded towards the city. The royal carriage was an open one, and its occupants, like those of the spectators, were soon whitened by the snow flakes. The long line of route was crowded, the general public apparently being anxious to avail themselves of the only opportunity that has been afforded to them of seeing the Royal couple. Immediately after leaving, the Princess dropped her veil, doubtless to conceal her tears. The procession proceeded slowly amid the acclamations of the people, which the Prince, with uncovered head, notwithstanding the inclemency of the day, appeared to acknowledge with grave earnestness and cordial respect.

At Temple Bar, which was elegantly decorated with flags, the Lord Mayor headed the procession, which passed over London Bridge, and was received with great cheering until it arrived at the railway station.

At a quarter to one o'clock, the time denoted, the procession entered the terminus at the Fin Clayers' Arms station.—Her Royal Highness was warmly clothed in a travelling costume, of a grayish color.—As the railway was the signal was given, one last cheer more was made, and as affectionate a "God speed you!" as ever accompanied a royal departure mingled with the rattle of the railway train which conveyed the Royal Highness to Gravesend. At 35 minutes past one a shrill whistle heard in the distance was succeeded by a dark cloud of smoke, and the next moment the royal train pulled into the Gravesend station. On leaving the train the Prince and Prince ss were conducted to a carriage drawn by four grays, which they entered alone, and road great enthusiasm passed through the town to the Terrace pier. They reached the pier at twenty minutes to two o'clock, the snow falling heavily. Here they were met by the mayor and corporation, who presented an address. Prince Albert and the Prince of Wales walked immediately behind the royal couple. The Princess appeared slightly agitated as bearing upon the arm of her royal husband. She walked slowly down the pier, preceded by a bevy of fair girls strewing flowers, and followed by an audible adieu. A roar of cannon announced the embarkation, and a few minutes afterwards the Victoria and Albert, joined by a small tender, was steaming down the river. In the wake of the royal yacht was a squadron of steam vessels of all dimensions, heavily freighted with passengers, but a cordon of guard ships kept strangers at a respectable distance. While the yachts remained in sight, the echoes of the surrounding hills were awakened by salutes of heavy ordnance, between which could be heard the cheers of the vast multitude collected on both banks of the river.

The royal yacht anchored at the Nore on Tuesday night, and proceeded at two on Wednesday morning for Antwerp. She was passed at half-past three a. m., abreast of the East Onze buoy, going very easy, and all the ships in a direct line, with a light air south-east and clear. The steam gun-vessel Alacrity, one of the squadron, in passing down channel, got ashore on the Sands, at half-past four, and was left high and dry. Assistance has been sent from Sheerness, and she would probably be got off. At Antwerp, on Tuesday evening, the weather became very tempestuous, and continued so a great part of the night.

ANTWERP, Feb. 3.

The royal squadron arrived in the Scheldt this morning at eleven, and reached Antwerp at four. The Prince and Princess were received on landing by the King of the Belgians, the English and Prussian ambassadors, the consuls, and the civic and military authorities of Antwerp. The royal party drove at once to the railway station, and left by special train at five for Brussels. Immense crowds lined the quays and the streets traversed by the procession, and the royal couple were everywhere received with enthusiastic acclamation. The Princess Royal looked remarkably well.

Great Britain is to manifest herself on the occasion of the procession, not by taking part in it, but by occupying some point of the line of the procession's progress; at this point the Englishmen resident or staying here will collect under the cover of a very considerable Union Jack, miniature copies of which, printed on white satin, form the distinctive badge of the nationality. Thus collected, they will give the Princess a British cheer when she passes as British lungs alone know how to perform this interesting act, but which to our aesthetically refined friends here, who never speak loud, will doubtless appear very vulgar.

Massacre of a Ship's Crew.

A letter from Tahiti, in the Moniteur de la Flotte, says:—The small Island of Flight one of the Tuamotus group, situate in latitude 21 deg. 40 min., and lon. 140 deg. 120, has been the scene of a carnage of which neither the precise period nor the details are as yet known. The Caledonian schooner Sarah Ann, which left the Gambiers for Papiti more than twelve months ago, had not reached her destination on the 14 June, 1857. A short time ago, another Caledonian schooner, the Julia, in passing near the same island, perceived the wreck of a vessel, and having communicated with some persons on shore, the captain of the Julia felt persuaded that it was the wreck of the Sarah Ann, and suspected that all hands on board had been massacred by the natives. The French Governments, jealous of guaranteeing full security in the islands placed under its protectorate, immediately sent the Milan steamer to attempt, if possible, to save some of the people of the vessel, or to chastise the inhabitants. The mission of the Milan, although skilfully conducted, was not attended with success; and afterwards, a lady named Stevens, mother of two young men who were on Board the Sarah Ann, chartered the Julia, and went herself in search of her children. The unfortunate mother could only recover some articles which belonged to them, but through the intelligence of the Indians whom she took with her she enabled to get on board the Julia sixteen of the natives (men, women, and children), who formed the majority of the inhabitants of the island, and carried them to Tahiti. They were immediately handed over to the French authorities and put in prison. On the day after arrival, the children, four in number, were entrusted to the care of persons who could be relied on to take proper care of them, and they were ordered to be taken every day to their parents, in order to show the difference between civilization and barbarism. Hitherto their parents have refused to give any account of the fate of the persons who were in the Sarah Ann.

☞ It would seem that the horrid tales which have been so long current respecting the mutilations by the natives of India of English men and women have been grossly exaggerated, if not actually untrue. It has been ascertained that no mutilated subjects have come down the Ganges or found their way to England. Lord Shaftesbury, who gave currency to the statement at a public meeting, intimated that the highest lady in India—meaning of course, the wife of the Governor-General—had spoken of the mutilations in her letters. His lordship has been applied to for additional information, and the result shows that Lord Shaftesbury made the assertion, on mere hearsay evidence.

The Vacant Judgeship.

We are not yet apprized of the choice of the government in filling up the vacancy on the Bench of these united Counties. It is said that the number of applicants is so great, and their respective claims so conflicting, that Mr. Macdonald has not so far been able to make the appointment.—In the meantime the Counties are suffering much, as the time for making the Judge's Circuit of the Division Court commenced on Friday last at Peterboro, and continues without interruption throughout the Counties. At this season, when so many claims are being prosecuted, the inconvenience arising out of an adjournment is very great, and in some cases justice may be thereby defeated, but if Mr. Macdonald is really intent upon selecting the best from among the applicants, the present temporary annoyance will be cheerfully borne, as leading to a continuation of that confidence which was so successfully established by the late incumbent. Whether Mr. Macdonald will allow any importance to attach to the circumstance of local connection, we cannot say, but it must be apparent to those who have observed the characters of the parties who commonly figure in the Division Courts, and the perplexing nature of their cross actions, that in order to do substantial justice, something more must weigh on the mind of the Judge than as it is there presented to him, otherwise it might be many times impossible to distinguish between evidence given under the same solemnities, with the same knowledge of facts, but bearing in directly opposite directions, and in support of issues which perhaps have arisen more out of passion than out of right, and which are regarded by the suitors as moral victories to be won.

The Parliament.

Parliament met on Thursday last and the House of Assembly having chosen the Honorable Henry Smith of Frontenac, to be their Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General, required their attendance in the Legislative Council Chamber, on Friday. The Speech will be found in another column, and it will be seen, promises a great many useful measures to be introduced by the government, but it happens strangely enough that the most of them have hitherto been considered as Opposition measures, and have been suppressed in the Legislature by Ministerial influence. Although it is always gratifying to make converts of one's opponents, yet it does not seem exactly right that the new comers should receive the rewards that are due to the men who prepared the way, and fought the battle to victory. Sir Edmund Head ought to have more respect for the early advocates of the measures he approves, than to ignore their claims, and allow them to be appropriated by the same party on the Treasury benches which has always opposed them. But notwithstanding the goodly array, there is a Blank which must leave great dissatisfaction in the country, since the principle of representation according to population was the chief question at the late elections in Canada West, and the government cannot but feel that in refusing to notice it from the Throne, they are practically ignoring the reform upon which the hearts of the great mass of the people are set. Even ministers, in order to gain their seats in the House, had to acquiesce, before the Electors, in the justness of their demand for equality of representation, and in the necessity of its becoming a government measure, but when their seats are secured, they forget the promises they made in order to get to them, and think only of the pecuniary advantage and political capital they can acquire by their places. In the debate which will arise upon the answer to the Address, the intentions of the Ministry will be more plainly discovered and the strength or weakness of the patriot party be more fully developed. At the election of Speaker the Ministerial nomination had a sweeping majority, but this division cannot be taken as a test, because it was not made a party question, and because, too, no other candidate was brought forward; consequently many who otherwise would not have voted for Mr. Smith, did so, out of good breeding, as no good could have arisen in refusing to stand up, as a compliment to the choice of the House. The allusion in the Speech, to the choice made by the Queen in the matter of the Seat of Government, is very shabby. If Ottawa is, by virtue of the Imperial selection, to be the Seat of Government, it should be expected that the Ministry would have the moral courage to demand its recognition by the Legislature, but in place of this open manner of dealing with it, they smuggle a reference to it into an obscure sentence, and make it appear that they attach no sort of consequence to it. On the whole there seems to be no reason to doubt that the Session will proceed but a short distance, before Mr. Macdonald will yield to the moral influence of the powerful party which is opposed to him, when the great struggle will begin, which shall dispel the illusion that Upper Canada cannot be united to Lower Canada upon such just principles as will satisfy a majority to either section.—The Opposition of the Parliament is not the Opposition of the last: men of infinite superiority of intelleetual and moral force have been returned on its principles, and the country will soon feel the benefit of the weight it has thrown into the scale.

Curious Wheat Speculations.

At the Mayor's Court, two boys were, last week, charged with stealing wheat from Mr. Peplow, out of his mill. The circumstances attending these operations are suggestive of such a repetition of their acts, as to have amounted to a very large quantity, taken together. It appears that these boys, who are of very tender years, crept under his mill, and by means of a sack in proper shape, made for the purpose, received at a hole at the bottom of the elevator, which receives the wheat after it passes out of the smut mill: when the mill was going, these boys entered with their bags, and opened the sluice: when they got enough, they shut it again, and decamped with their booty, even in day light, to their house, which is but a short distance from the mill, and where several families run one society. From the secluded position of their means of access to the sluice, the operation may have been carried on for a long time, and might have indefinitely continued, for, although Mr. Peplow knew by his deficiencies, for months back, that he was being robbed, he never could ascertain how it was effected, but having a small grist for a customer, and finding that some three bushels of wheat were reduced to the weight of two, by grinding, he made a search, which resulted in the discovery of the young delinquents, who were then taken to gaol.—The poor boys, however, are not the sacrifices that ought to be made to justice, for they never would have carried on such a business, if they had not been encouraged to it by the older persons who were the receivers of the stolen property, and thus, with diminished risk, enjoyed the profits of the transaction. Mr. Peplow has latterly become so notorious for his bad yield, that his customers have felt very shy towards him, and were trying their luck with other millers, so that his loss was doubled by the tolling to which he was subjected. They need not hesitate now to return to him, as the cause of complaint is removed and his character re-established. The boys were committed for trial.

☞ We have great pleasure in publishing the subjoined resolutions, as therein requested, and beg from the relatives of the distinguished deceased, to whom they are addressed, their acceptance from us of a communion of sentiment with the language of the resolutions:—

At a meeting of the members of the legal profession, resident in the Town of Peterboro' held at the office of Robert Dynes Esq., on Monday, the 15th day of February, A. D. 1858, Sandford F. Kirkpatrick Esq., in the Chair.

It was unanimously resolved:

1. That we deeply, and sincerely regret the death of George Barber Hall, Esq., late Judge of the County Court of the United Counties of Peterborough, and Victoria.

2. That by his death we have to lament the loss of an impartial and courteous Judge, as well as of an able and sound lawyer, and sincere friend; and the community in which we live have been deprived of the services of one of its brightest ornaments.

3. That we beg to offer our most respectful condolence to his bereaved widow and family on this melancholy event.

4. That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to John Hall, Esq., and also to the Editors of the Peterboro' papers, with a request that they will insert the same.

S. F. KIRKPATRICK,
Chairman.

THE LAST OF HIS RACE.—The last male descendant of Boswell, the friend and biographer of Johnson, has just departed this life, and the name and title of Boswell has become extinct through the death of Sir James Boswell, of Auchinleck-house, county of Argyle, which happened on the 4th ult., in his 51st year. The famous Boswell left by his wife, the daughter of his uncle, Mr. A. Montgomerie, of Dalshaw, North Britain, besides two daughters, an only son, Alexander, who was created a baronet in 1821, at the coronation of King George IV., but, lost his life in a duel the following year. His only son was the baronet so recently deceased; two daughters, we believe, survive to lament their parent's loss and to carry the name of Boswell into other families.

We are authorized to inform the parties who have connected the above paragraph that the male line of Boswell is not extinct, nor likely soon to become so. Mr. John Crerar Boswell of Cobourg represents the ancient male line in Canada, and seemingly in Scotland too. What success he has met with in preserving his stock we are not aware, but failing him, his brother, Mr. George Goldie Boswell can have nothing laid to his charge, for he reckons some nine males of good promise in his family alone.

☞ McConnel's Hotel in Bobcaygeon, was burnt down last week. It was not insured.

Parliamentary Reform Demonstration.

On Wednesday night a meeting was held in the Freemasons' Hall for the purpose of promoting a union between the middle and working classes, so that the reform of Parliament might be furthered by combining agitation. The basis of this union, according to the resolution submitted to the meeting, was the principle of manhood suffrage. There was a numerous attendance of middle and working classes, the hall and galleries being crowded to excess, and the proceedings were of the most exciting description. Mr. Herbert Ingram, M. P., who was called to the chair, among other introductory remarks said that the experience of the last fifteen years must have convinced all men that the working classes, could do nothing without the co-operation of the middle classes, and it was equally apparent that the middle classes were powerless without the aid of the working classes. A resolution to the effect that no Reform Bill would be complete or satisfactory which did not include as its leading feature the principle of manhood suffrage, was, after considerable discussion, carried amid general cheering. Mr. Cuninghame, M. P., Mr. Townsend, M. P., Mr. Ernest Jones, Mr. Bronterre O'Brien, and others, addressed the meeting. A vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the proceedings.

Provincial Parliament.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

THURSDAY, Feb. 25, 1858.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

After the members of the House had returned from the Legislative Council Chamber—

The Hon. J. A. MACDONALD rose and said he had the honour to propose the honourable and learned member for Frontenac as Mr. Speaker for the present Parliament. In doing so he need only call the attention of the House to the fact that he (Mr. H. Smith) was one of the oldest members now sitting in Parliament. He believed that he entered it in 1841, and that he was, with the exception of the hon. gentleman for Lanark, Haldimand and Wentworth, the oldest member of the House. He had been elected from the time of the union, but had sat for the county with an interruption until the present day. He (Mr. Macdonald) need not say anything of the experience he had enjoyed in everything relating to the rules and practice of Parliament. He had not only been many years in the House, but as was well known, he had taken an active and leading part in Parliament, as a representative of the people. He (Mr. Macdonald) had it might well on this arrangement which was more implied than expressed, at the time of the formation of the union that the Speaker should be chosen alternately from each section of the Province. (Hear, hear.) That principle had obtained since the union, and he had thought it well to assume the responsibility of continuing that practice. He would also say that he believed his honourable and learned friend (Mr. Smith) had a thorough acquaintance with the French language, so that the House would not be subjected to any inconvenience on that account.

Hon. E. CARTIER seconded the nomination.

Mr. BROWN said he could not by any means endorse the high compliments which had been paid by the Attorney General West to the hon. member whom he proposed as Speaker. He thought that many members of the House were, by character, and temper and general position before the country, much better entitled to the office of Speaker than the hon. gentleman selected. However, Her Majesty's Opposition, in the exercise of their discretion considered that it would not be advisable on that occasion to bring forward an opposition candidate, ("Hear, hear," from the Ministerial side of the House.) There could be no doubt but that the gentleman who occupied the Treasury benches had a majority of the House. He believed they had a large majority from Lower Canada, though, fortunately, not a majority of the Western section of the Province, (Hear, hear.) Still they did command a majority of the united Legislature, they had chosen the Solicitor General West as their nominee for the office of Speaker, they had the power to elect him—and the Opposition did not think it necessary to have any party contest on this occasion. (Hear, hear.) They threw the responsibility entirely upon the gentlemen opposite of placing in the Speaker's chair the candidate they had named. The responsibility rested with them alone, and if the result answered their expectations, the members of the Opposition side of the House would be well satisfied.

Mr. PATRICK wished to say that he had an objection to the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. H. Smith) because of his remarkable modesty, (a laugh)—but he believed that the Solicitor General West possessed a generous and kind heart, and he trusted that when the hon. gentleman was elevated to the high position of Speaker, without opposition from the Members comprising Her Majesty's loyal Opposition—(hears hear)—he would show that impartiality to every Member which the House expected at his hands (Hear, hear.) He was glad to know that the Opposition side of the House were so British in feeling that they were disposed to adopt the British practice of not giving rise to mere political contests on such questions as that which was now before the House. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. MACKENZIE rose and said that if the exponents of the opinions of those who sent them to Parliament were satisfied with Mr. Smith, it was well; but if there was no other candidate proposed by any other member, he was sure he would not propose one. At the same time, as the oldest member of that House, he could not help saying, that the appointment of the person proposed by the Hon. Attorney-General West was a disgrace to Canada. (Hear, hear.) He repeated that the personal as well as the political character of the member nominated for the Speakership, was a disgrace to himself, and it was a disgrace to the House and to the country that he should be chosen as Speaker. At the same time he (Mr. Mackenzie) was willing to submit to what the majority might do in the matter, and contented himself by simply expressing his opinion of the character of the candidate brought forward. When one looked back at only at what took place on one night during last Parliament, and reviewed the conduct of the Attorney General West and the Solicitor General West—men who from their station should be examples of good breeding, but who did not even demean themselves with common decency—he had reason to feel strong apprehension for the reputation of the House. He (Mr. Mackenzie) stood till he could stand it no longer—and then he went home. (Laughter.) He had expressed himself strongly on many occasions, but he had never been called to account for what he had said; but of the Solicitor General West it could fairly be said that his conduct had been indecent, and quite opposed to that which would reasonably be expected from a gentleman chosen to occupy the Chair, and it would be a deep stain upon the House if a majority were found by the Ministry to elect him. The majority of the members of the House were strangers to him (Mr. Mackenzie), and he could not therefore say if the Opposition would show strength or weakness by putting forward another candidate. If the House were of opinion that Mr. Smith was a proper person to fill the chair, any opposition which he might offer by proposing an amendment, would be perfectly futile, and would perhaps expose his weakness. He should not, therefore, adopt that course.—He could not help remarking, however, that there was such a wide difference between the hon. member, now Judge of Quebec, and the hon. member opposite, that it seemed like a nightmare that such a proposition should be made, seconded and carried in the Canadian House of Assembly in the 19th century. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. CAMPBELL entered his protest against what had fallen from the Hon. Attorney General West, that the House should be fettered in their choice of a Speaker from either the Upper or the Lower Canada members. (Hear, hear.) He had come to the House determined to vote for the best man proposed without respect to party, and without enquiring whether he came from Upper or Lower Canada.

The Hon. Mr. CAUCHON was in favour of the double majority system, and would fight for it as long as he lived. For this reason, if for no other, he should vote for the hon. member for Frontenac.

Mr. HOGAN said that, as a new member of the House, occupying a place on the Opposition benches against the wishes of many of those who had for years been his personal friends, he thought it proper to say a few words in explanation of the course he intended taking on the present occasion. The Government had, as had been stated, proposed the hon. member for Frontenac as Speaker, on the principle that they were bound to carry out the alternative system: that was to say that the Speaker should be elected alternately from the two Provinces. Now, he denied that this principle applied in this particular case. He asserted that the hon. member for Frontenac did not represent the feelings of the people of the Upper Province. (Hear, hear.) The Ministry had appealed to the people, and had been beaten in Upper Canada. (Hear, hear.)—and he contended that if the alternative system were carried out, it ought to be adopted in favour of the majority from Upper Canada. (Hear, hear.) Neither might the position of the hon. gentleman as Solicitor General in the Government during last Parliament to have any weight with the House in electing him as Speaker; for he owed it to the Government, he owed it to the House, and he owed it to the country to stand or fall according as, after the general election, the Government to which he belonged obtained the support of the House. (Hear, hear.) A very important constitutional question was involved. The Government had been beaten in Upper Canada, and a majority of the House would declare that the Solicitor General and the Government with which he was connected had not their confidence. Could the House say that it was an evidence of reciprocity, or that they did justice to Upper Canada when they force I down the throats of the members of Upper Canada a member whom the people of Upper Canada condemned? (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. Hogan) took a very sincere and deep interest in another gentleman being Speaker—he referred to the hon. gentleman, the member for Cornwall. If that gentleman had been chosen he would have been a credit to the House, and far more agreeable to the country than the candidate proposed; but although they could promise him a very considerable Upper Canadian majority, yet in view of a large Lower Canadian majority, the hon. gentleman he had referred to did not think it proper to stand a contest. What Lower Canadian members said they would give to the Upper Canada people was simply this, that the Speakers should be elected by the Lower Canada members, but that they should be chosen from each section of the Province alternately, so that they should not hurt the feelings of the Upper Canadian people. This was not carrying out the principle of reciprocity. He contended that if a Speaker were chosen from among the Upper Canadian members he should be a gentleman in whom the people of Upper Canada had confidence; and concluded by saying that because he did not consider the Solicitor General West deserving of being placed in the Speaker's chair, he should give his vote against him. (Hear, hear.)

Hon. J. SS MACDONALD did not intend on this occasion to say much respecting the qualifications of the hon. member proposed for Speakership. Like himself that hon. member had been in Parliament for the last seventeen or eighteen years; and certainly if experience would entitle him to the office he ought to have it. (Hear, hear.) He could not forbear alluding to the difference in the sentiments expressed by two hon. members who would support the Ministerial nomination. On the one hand the hon. member for Rouville declared he would be fettered by no arrangement; while on the other hand, the very principle which was thus repudiated, was the sole motive of the hon. member for Montmorenci in supporting the member for Frontenac. Now, while he (Mr. McDonald) did not wish to carry the principle to the same extent as the hon. member for Montmorenci, he still could not repudiate it altogether, while it was carried out to the fullest extent in the Government. (Hear, hear.) He recollected the first time this double majority system was carried into effect was when Mr. Hincks attempted the election of a Speaker. That was the first occasion on which the reciprocity system so well alluded to by the hon. member for Grey to-day came into action. In the early parliaments, Mr. Cauchon was proposed because he had a majority from both sections of the country. A memorable change took place when Sir Allan McNab was elected by an Upper Canadian majority. That was somewhat of a parallel case; but at that period the question of Lower Canada against Upper Canada had not been invoked. To-day we have this fact, that while reciprocity is pretended to be given to the people of Upper Canada, a majority of people will be found protesting against the election of the hon. member for Frontenac. It was true they could not expect, in ordinary cases, to carry their point with a minority. But if the principle of reciprocity was to be followed out,—if they were anxious to give Upper Canada the right of choosing a member,—the nomination ought not to be pressed. He would not, as he had previously remarked, say anything as to the qualifications of the hon. member for Frontenac. But he hoped that the expectations which his friend had formed, would be carried out; and that on the Opposition side of the House, he would meet that support which his responsible situation would call for. (Cheers.) With these few remarks, he would conclude by stating that as Upper Canada had not on this occasion the choice of a Speaker—he meant to record his vote against the nomination.

Mr. BURTON denied that the late Government had been thoroughly beaten in Upper Canada; at any rate the question remained to be tried. But there was one thing certain—the regular opposition had been thoroughly beaten. (Derisive cheers.) There was a class of politicians who called themselves Conservatives, such as the honourable gentleman (Mr. Hogan) who had just sat down, but he believed that they would not have been returned to the House if their constituents had thought they would have thrown themselves into the arms of the Opposition.

Mr. FERRES said if he understood the hon. member for Grey, they were expected to choose a Speaker from the minority of the House. With respect to the majority of Upper Canadian members being against the present administration, he believed the fact had yet to be ascertained. The gist of his (Mr. Hogan's) remarks amounted to this, that the Lower Canadian members should have nothing to say on the subject, but that a certain portion of the members from Upper Canada should decide. For his own part, he looked upon it as a matter of etiquette, and did not think it essential that the Speaker should be elected from one section or the other. Where two members of the House were equally qualified, one being from Upper and the other from Lower Canada, etiquette demanded that they should give the preference to that section which had not furnished the Speaker in the previous Parliament. With the principle of his honourable friend from Grey he could not concur. To suppose that a large minority from, Upper Canada and a large majority from Lower Canada were to allow a small section of Upper Canada to give them a Speaker, was a principle which he thought no member on the floor of the House would entertain.

Mr. DUFRESNE thought that this was the proper moment to test the question, to see how each party stood. As to saying that the votes of Lower Canadian members would very likely carry the question, he believed the gentleman had advanced that argument before he could decide the question himself. He was willing to vote for a gentleman from Upper Canada if he was a person qualified to fill the duties of the situation, but he did not say that a member if no Lower Canada would not receive his support. He believed, though the contrary had been asserted by some gentleman, that it had been uniformly the custom to select a Speaker from Upper and Lower Canada alternately. If his memory served him right, the first Speaker was Mr. Cuvillier, the second was Sir Allan MacNab, the third was the Hon. Mr. Morin, the fourth was the honourable member from Cornwall (J. S. Macdonald,) the fifth was the Commissioner of Crown Lands, and the sixth now proposed was from Upper Canada; three from Upper, and three from Lower Canada; and therefore he did not say that any gentleman who should be proposed from Lower Canada would not receive his vote, when he recollected the agreement which was entered into at the time of the Union. (Cries of "No no.") Gentlemen might say no, no, but it was understood, and he should follow it out. Considering also that the hon. gentleman now proposed was qualified to fulfil the duties of the important office, and considering that it was in accordance with the agreement entered upon at the time of the Union, he should give him his support.

Mr. PICOTTE having replied to Mr. Dufresne, the House divided, Yeas 79, Nays 12.

their obligations to pay in specie. Yet, there is no doubt that the pressure has been, and still is, severe on our merchants, our land-owners, and our farmers. There is no doubt, too, that much may be done to amend and improve our own commercial legislation. I earnestly recommend these matters to your attention, and I therefore solicit your consideration of the following subjects:—

The expediency of assimilating the commercial law of Upper and Lower Canada: The law of imprisonment for debt, and the law of insolvency in Upper Canada: The law regarding fraudulent assignments and preferences, and that relating to the interest of money in commercial transactions of every kind.

It appears to me also that the Jury Laws require revision, and that the Municipal law of Upper Canada may be with advantage amended and consolidated.

There are no statutory provisions more important to the country than those which regulate the franchise, and the trial of controverted elections. Being of opinion that the present acts require amendment, I trust that you will do all in your power to improve and simplify the existing system. I believe, too, that it would be expedient to secure the proper registration and protection of all qualified voters.

A measure will be laid before you for amending and simplifying the whole system of management of our Public Lands, and facilitating their occupation by industrious settlers. I am glad to state that the number of emigrants in the course of the year just ended, was considerably in excess of that of the previous year. A large extent of territory in different parts of the Province has been surveyed for the purpose of immediate occupation. Experience has proved that the opening of roads through the forest has much facilitated the settlement of our wild lands. By making these roads on a system at once uniform and comprehensive, there is every reason to expect the best results from the aid granted by the Legislature.

The subject of the fisheries in both sections of the Province is one which deserves your attention, as I believe that they may be so dealt with, as hereafter to become a source of revenue.

In Lower Canada, the Legislative changes made in the Judicial system have been brought into operation. I trust that more ready access to justice and the speedy termination of civil suits will be the result of these provisions.

I congratulate you on the continued success of the Canadian Line of Steamers.—They have already placed our intercourse with Europe on a new footing, and I look forward with pleasure to the establishment of a weekly line to the St. Lawrence during next summer. I recommend to your notice the increasing value of the Lake commerce of Canada. Our trade with Chicago and the Western States promises to be important alike to the Upper and Lower Sections of the Province.

During the recess, a correspondence has taken place with the Imperial Government and with the sister colonies of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in which the importance to Imperial interests of an Inter-Colonial Railway and Military road to Halifax has been pressed on the attention of the Home Government. This correspondence I will cause to be submitted for your consideration.

As this Province has already gone to the utmost limit of pecuniary aid to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, it affords me pleasure to state my confident expectation that such aid will prove sufficient to secure the advantages promised by the completion of its works; and I doubt not that the community at large are sensible of the benefits derived from this great and important undertaking.

Gentlemen of the Legislative Assembly,

The commercial difficulties to which I have already alluded will be found to have affected our revenue. This was to be expected, but the diminution is such as to inspire us with no fears for the credit of the future prosperity of the country. I believe you will find that due economy has been used in the expenditure of the funds entrusted to the Executive Government, and that effectual supervision over the public accounts has been maintained by the Board of Audit. I have to ask of you, in the present Session, such supplies as may be required for the public service.

Honorable Gentlemen and Gentlemen,

Correspondence in relation to the Hudson's Bay Company and its territory, will be laid before you: as well as an answer to your address presented to Her Most Gracious Majesty on the subject of the Seat of Government. On the first of these subjects it will be for you to consider the propositions made by Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies to the Company, and to weigh well the bearing of these propositions on the interests and rights of Canada. Papers will also be submitted to you showing clearly the steps taken by the Provincial Government for the assertion of those interests and rights, and for their future maintenance.

I now leave you to the performance of your Legislative duties.

The members of the Legislative Assembly having retired, the House adjourned until Monday next.

House of Assembly.

FRIDAY, Feb. 26, 1858.

The Speaker then took the chair shortly after three o'clock.

The Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, having appeared at the bar, intimated that his Excellency the Governor General desired the attendance of the Legislative Assembly in the Chamber of the Legislative Council. The members of the Assembly, headed by the Speaker, accordingly proceeded to the Legislative Council Chamber.

The Speaker of the House of Assembly, standing at the bar of the Legislative Council, briefly addressed his Excellency, stating his appointment to the office of Speaker, and his felt inadequacy rightly to discharge its duties, but claiming for the House of Assembly all its ancient rights and privileges.

The Speaker of the Legislative Council made a formal reply on behalf of his Excellency, assuring the Assembly that there would be no interference with their rights and privileges, and that his Excellency would, at all seasonable times, be ready to receive representations from them on matters affecting the public interest.

The Governor General then delivered the Speech from the Throne, which we publish elsewhere. His Excellency read it first in English and then in French.

The members of Assembly having returned to their own House, the Speaker again took the Chair, and read copies, in both languages, of the Governor's Speech.

Attorney Gen. MACDONALD—(carrying out the usage which requires that some act on the part of the House shall intervene between hearing the Governor's Speech and fixing a day for its consideration)—moved for leave to introduce a Bill to provide for the administration of oaths to persons appointed to be Justices of the Peace.

Leave being granted, the Bill was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time this day fortnight.

Atty General MACDONALD then moved that his Excellency's Speech be taken into consideration on Monday next. He hoped that any amendments to be proposed would be distributed in sufficient time beforehand.

Mr. BROWN said he must take opportunity to have it understood that he could not be necessarily bound to a day's delay.

Atty Gen. MACDONALD—Certainly.

The motion was then agreed to.

Atty Gen. MACDONALD moved that there be referred to the Standing Committee on Printing, for their guidance, instead of accepting the old rule, as a matter of course. In regard to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, it was his intention to propose that the Committee on Public Accounts, which was a committee of the whole House, should be appointed a Committee on Privileges and Elections, as it was composed of more than one-third of the members of the House, having public business to attend to. It was too much to ask of members to serve on two committees at once, and he thought the Committee on Public Accounts was the most important of the two.

Mr. MACKENZIE thought it was necessary that the present Parliament should know upon what principles and rules they were to act. He was opposed to the appointment of the Committee on Public Accounts, as it was a committee of the whole House, and he thought it was the province of the House to watch the Executive. It was too much to ask of members to serve on two committees at once, and he thought the Committee on Public Accounts was the most important of the two.

Atty Gen. With respect to the remarks of the member for Haldimand he believed the public purse was safer under the control of the fat and well-fed men who had been used to hold the strings, than it would probably be in the keeping of the lean and hungry expectants who had never had a chance of getting their fingers into it. He moved that the House do now adjourn.

The House then adjourned till Monday at 3 P. M.

Arrival of the "Anglo-Saxon."

GREAT BRITAIN.

On the 5th instant, in the House of Lords, Lord Lyndhurst asked whether any communication had passed between the British and French Governments respecting certain insulting paragraphs which appeared in the Moniteur. He considered that the French Government, by authorizing the publication of those insults, had taken the responsibility.

Earl Granville said that a note had been received from Count Walewski, in which explanations were given of the publication of certain addresses, and in which the regret of the Emperor was expressed at the appearance of anything offensive to the English nation.

A vote of thanks to the army in India was agreed to, after some objections made by Lord Canning, the Governor General being included in the vote.

In the House of Commons a vote of thanks to the army in India was carried, after some exceptions being taken, as in the Upper House.

Lord Palmerston moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to conspiracy to murder, to make it felony. He said the proposition was made in consequence of a recent attempt on the life of the Emperor of the French. That attempt was the result of a conspiracy formed in England; and the consequence was that foreign nations had formed an opinion that Parliament ought to take some steps to remove upon more suspicion conspirators from Britain. The Government, however, had no intention to propose any rash measure; although, under the circumstances, they were driven to consider the present state of the law with regard to conspiracy. He explained the appearance of offensive addresses in the Moniteur, and the Emperor's regret for the same; and concluded by pointing out the necessity for an amendment of the law on general grounds.

Mr. Kingslake moved a resolution in the shape of an amendment—that the House, while anxious upon every proper occasion to consider any defect in criminal law, deemed it inexpedient in compliance with the demand contained in Walewski's despatch, until further information had been afforded by the production of any communications between the two Governments subsequent to the date of that despatch. He declined to concur in altering the municipal law of the country upon the demand of any power whatever.

Several speeches were made against the proposed measure, including a very sarcastic one by Mr. Roebuck, when the debate was adjourned. The following evening the debate was resumed, and after speeches by Lord John Russell, Disraeli, and others, in favour of leave being granted to bring in a bill, Lord Palmerston's motion was agreed to by a vote of 299 to 98.

Mr. Baring presented the East India Company's petition against any alteration in the government of India.

Nothing of importance transpired in the House.

The London Morning Post says that one of the principals in the late attempt on Napoleon, is an Englishman, named Thos. Allsopp, ex-member of the Stock Exchange.

Election rioting had taken place in Limerick. Many persons were seriously injured, and the military were called out to restore order.

The Naples Calamity.

The details of this calamity, which more recent inquiries have brought to light, are heart rending in the extreme. An extract from the letter of an Englishman on the spot reveals these particulars respecting a village called Tito in the interior:—All the houses are destroyed, and 300 persons killed. The scene baffles all description. It might be likened to a place that had been battered down by a cannon. Of some houses the entire sides were levelled with the ground, and we could see the interior blackened with smoke, and pieces of broken furniture standing about; in others, the roofs had fallen in, and only the outer walls were standing. The winter stock of grain or corn were mingled with the ruins, and pigs were digging among them for food.—On the hill above the town a few government huts were erected—perhaps 30 of them—one of which was used as a hospital. Here, everywhere, we heard that a few had been wounded, but we met with no case requiring amputation. In one place 34 bodies had been dug out together, in another 17 had been found locked in each other's arms. A house was pointed out to us of which the entire side had fallen, and on it persons had been originally seated to a wedding feast, and the eighth, a woman named Carmina, was dug out the next morning. The most harrowing incident we met with was the following:—Seven or eight persons had been killed up to the time of the fall of a house; one child only managed to escape, but during the night the upper part of the house fell in, and the poor little creature was heard crying for help. Some relatives of the family were at once employed in endeavouring to find it, and after some time succeeded in extricating it from the ruins.

The Travellers Livingston and Atkinson.

Last Monday's meeting, the Royal Geographical Society were favored by hearing the first account of Mr. Atkinson's and Monsieur Perrot's journey to the Amoor. We were prepared to hear of a fifteen months' imprisonment in Siberia, but Mr. Atkinson's projected expedition would run through the coast of which belonged to Portugal, it would be well to escape even Portuguese imprisonment with it. But to this Dr. Livingstone objected. He said that an instance of the kind of international courtesy was furnished in Egypt lately, on the occasion of the travel expedition which the Pasha of the country, took place on the journey of the Nile. When the consul had learned what the authorities of Egypt discussed between them, he found that the Pasha had determined to arrest him, and also to seize his papers. He said that he did not want to injure men, who had a taste for natural objects, but practical men—men who could turn their knowledge to account. Mr. Livingstone was of opinion that the Russian Government would not be very much pleased with the travelling of Englishmen in Siberia, but that no new expedition would be undertaken to defend, on the part of others, that I will gratify him with a few words in reply.

Port Hope is not very wide of the mark when he says, all his five points of difference, as between Jno. S. and Jas. Smith and myself, have been completely met and answered, not by the President's letter to me, but by mine to him; he has been told, and Port Hope knows it, that those five points are mere side issues to cover a deeper object, that they are of importance to me as part of a whole I do not deny, but they are not the thing itself. What I mainly complain of is, the treatment I have experienced from Mr. J. S. and Jas. Smith as members of the Railway Board, who, when it suits their convenience, assume that position in attacking me, and when answered, take the ground they have nothing to be answerable for, it is the Town I have to look to for a settlement of the questions raised. I have exerted myself in no ordinary degree to open a communication between Peterboro' and Port Hope, and am far in advance of my contract to gain this object, which has been done at a very heavy pecuniary loss to me, instead of receiving thanks for my exertions, much less evincing any desire to make an equivalent for the losses sustained, I am refused what is due to me on the work actually performed, told I require watching, and that they Mr. J. S. and Jas. Smith, must remain sufficient to finish the road in their Solomon's till risks. By them it would be made to appear that I have been demanding the ten per cent retained under the contract, for the completion of the finished work, which is totally false, as my Engineer's statement shows, but if I am to be taxed I have to look for their subscription of Stock, what has Mr J. S. and Jas had been worked, but we met with no Engineer's certificate, that I received all the money in the Bank at my last payment, they [illegible] Port Hope, as I know it [illegible] to Port Hope to New York by [illegible] and that [illegible] I consent and a resolution passed [illegible] that effect, and in doing this the [illegible] Port Hope [illegible] Peterboro' [illegible] Cobourg road [illegible]

[illegible] Yours truly, [illegible]

To the Editor of the Atlas.

SIR,—I observe in Thursday's Guide, some new bolder afraid or ashamed to come out under his own proper name, has assumed that of Port Hope, and taken up the cudgels for my friends Jno. Shuter and James Smith, it is an unmanly act, and I am not bound by custom or right, to pay any attention to these stab in the dark gentry, nevertheless, Port Hope seems to be such an innocent or such a novice in the matters he undertakes to defend, on the part of others, that I will gratify him with a few words in reply.

Port Hope is not very wide of the mark when he says, all his five points of difference, as between Jno. S. and Jas. Smith and myself, have been completely met and answered, not by the President's letter to me, but by mine to him; he has been told, and Port Hope knows it, that those five points are mere side issues to cover a deeper object, that they are of importance to me as part of a whole I do not deny, but they are not the thing itself. What I mainly complain of is, the treatment I have experienced from Mr. J. S. and Jas. Smith as members of the Railway Board, who, when it suits their convenience, assume that position in attacking me, and when answered, take the ground they have nothing to be answerable for, it is the Town I have to look to for a settlement of the questions raised. I have exerted myself in no ordinary degree to open a communication between Peterboro' and Port Hope, and am far in advance of my contract to gain this object, which has been done at a very heavy pecuniary loss to me, instead of receiving thanks for my exertions, much less evincing any desire to make an equivalent for the losses sustained, I am refused what is due to me on the work actually performed, told I require watching, and that they Mr. J. S. and Jas. Smith, slip up on that? We shall see—what a jury will say in reference to the two estimates; and next time I want Mr. Sharp Shooter's engineer to estimate, it will be after the Government Inspector of Railways has gone over the line before he made out his certificate: he has only given me two certificates since I commenced, and I do not believe he has been over the line twice in his life; still he can make out a certificate when he has Mr. Shooter and Mr. James Smith to watch me and give him instructions. Mr. John Shooter says that I want the Company to take the road. I can only say that such is a maddening lie, for I do not believe the Company has any thing to do with my road and I will watch them.

Yours truly,
JOHN FOWLER.

Port Hope, Feb. 22, 1858.

To the Editor of the Atlas.

SIR,—I am rather amused with Mr. Chieseller Jas. Smith's letter in the Guide. He says, "I beg to say, that although he has not correctly reported the remarks respecting the transaction between the Railway Company and Messrs. Zimmerman & Baldwin, yet I am happy to agree with him that we have not yet settled the account of this firm, we still have the opportunity of investigating it." Now I feel glad that Mr. Chieseller, alias Jas. Smith is going to have an investigation. He had best look into the certificate [illegible] Jno. Clark, the Company's Engineer, for I think first gentleman will say on the [illegible] had the road [illegible] the road with Mr. Tate, and that he would not have it; but he would have [illegible] and as he was doing good sales to the contract as he and Tate had cleared £500 each out of a month's work. Now Clark was telling me no untruth or else Jno. Shuter Smith tells a negative in his letter, for he says, Tate & Clark had the road I used when they took my rear over it. Now I don't believe the latter [illegible] yet; but if they have, I wish them luck with it and their contract; they can get different estimates to me. That is, Mr. J. Sharp Shooter and Mr. Chas. James will look out for Clark, as he is one of the family. Cousin Chieseller! Chief Fowler, or anybody else, as long as it comes into the family. Mr. James Chieseller Smith further says that he is still going to look after the Branch; it seems that he has changed very much since last year at this time; and, since that, he wanted to sacrifice the Branch because Mr. Burton wanted to have it. So the Smiths go all for self. It is not three weeks since Clarke said he would have Mr. Tate off the line, as he was of no use to him; and that there was nothing to divide in the contract, so it seems he did not think £1,000 worth dividing, and I should not be surprised to hear that Tate has not got his £500 yet, as I that Clarke has kept all the thousand. As for the road having been leased I do not believe it is. I would not believe the sharpings Smiths, nor would I believe Clarke, if all three told me it was leased; but I will bet any of them £50 it is not leased to Clarke and Tate; nor never was, and never will be. They may publish all those lies, and no doubt a great number of people will believe them, but I will not believe it is leased until I see Kirchoffer's signature, in print, stating the case to be so. After reading Mr. John Sharp Shooter's letter I would not believe him on his oath.

Yours truly,
JOHN FOWLER.

Port Hope, Feb. 22, 1858.

From the Toronto Globe.

Although we do not perceive any material improvement in trade, or rise in the money market of late weeks, which we expected to have witnessed commercial men generally. The continuance of good sleighing, and the large amount of produce which has changed hands during the week must be productive of a better state of affairs before long. About $10,000 per day has been sent out of the city during the week, for purchases here and elsewhere, and we learn that several of the banks are affording more liberal accommodation to many country millers, so that on the whole there must be a good deal of money going into circulation just now, the beneficial effect of which must very soon be felt. Another source of relief too has been announced during the week viz: the success of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in effecting a loan in England to the extent of five million, eight hundred thousand dollars, for the purpose of completing the road. The expenditure of this amount, fully equal to one half of the present bank circulation in the Province, must afford ample relief and enable us to get through the present hard time. Not only increases our burden, and adds $248,000 to the already large amount of interest annually sent out of the Province. It is not probable that much gold will be brought out, but our banks will sell exchange and draw against it, issuing their own bills here to an equal extent. This course will reduce the discount for exchange, by which the banks make a large share, and must less our dealers have learned a profitable lesson in the past few months, they may be tempted by the accommodation thus afforded, to import again too freely.

In this connection, it is not amiss to notice an article which recently appeared in the London Times, with reference to a meeting in London, of the creditors of Mr. John Henderson, of this city who succumbed a month or two ago. It is necessary to state the condition of the affairs of Mr. Henderson, as misrepresented at that meeting and since set right by himself in the columns of the different city papers, but the expose is useful, as it exhibits several important features of trade—the most important of which is the enormous amount of credit granted to our merchants by English manufacturers and merchants, without security. To this evil-indeed accommodation may be ascribed, in a great measure, the large importations of the past three years and the fearful amount of over trading, and crediting that has necessarily ensued, and which has resulted in the present unhappy position. An extensive credit is always a temptation, and generally, as in the case before us, turns out unfavourably, and if the article in the Times results in no other harm in checking this tendency to large credits, it will on the whole be productive of good. If Mr. Henderson's case is a type of others in his position, another important truth is illustrated, —that merchants finding themselves insolvent, sacrifice so much to sustain their credit, without success. It is just as hard to arrive at the unhappy determination to suspend at one time as another, and it is the duty of a man, when he finds the balance hopelessly against him, to call his creditors together without delay, and place his affairs in their hands, instead of going on at an immense sacrifice,—either borrowing money at enormously high rates, or pushing off his goods at a losing price, or for worthless paper. This course, no doubt, is prompted by the best of motives, but it will be better for himself, and much more satisfactory to his creditors, if he stops at once. Certainly he will be able to exhibit a much better balance sheet, and he will find himself in a position far more enviable than if he went on sacrificing. The manner in which this case was represented before the English creditors, made it appear that Mr Henderson had made a large preference to local claims in his assignment—which however, is not the case, as out of £62,000, his preferences are only £2,800. Yet the principal that preferential assignments are legal is evident, and the Times animadverts strongly thereon, and not without cause. That they are an injustice, none will deny: and we are certain that the great majority of the people earnestly desire a law preventing them, and making all creditors to share alike, without distinction. We hope that a bill will be introduced during the ensuing session of Parliament, to amend this grievance. The greatest matter for surprise is that these preferential assignments are not more frequent; and it speaks well for the honesty and forbearance of the people, that during times like the present, such loopholes are not taken more advantage of. So far from our merchants "practically looking upon English creditors as foreigners, and every effort being made to defraud their claims," there is no indebtedness they would sooner discharge; and we feel assured that there is not an importer in the Province but regards the claims of his English creditor as of as great importance as those of his immediate vicinity. Notwithstanding the hard times, the temptations of extensive credit, and the difficulty of meeting engagements, we have yet to hear of failures as bad, in extent and what

PATENT

ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials, and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either under dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its Beauty.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Pots, Roofing, Facing, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its Durability.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its Cheapness.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICK IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed [post-paid] to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

Provincial Parliament.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

TORONTO, Monday, March 1, 1858.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 3 o'clock.

Hon. Mr DESBARATS rose to give notice of a motion for an address to her Majesty, congratulating her on the auspicious marriage of the Princess Royal. This event had not been mentioned in the speech from the Throne. He took it for granted it was an omission, not arising from any inadvertance, but that official notification had not been made to the Governor General. Perhaps, in the ordinary course of events, it was not usual to present an address until the official announcement had been made. But his honourable friends had perhaps forgotten that a notification to the world at large had appeared in the London Gazette. This being the case, he thought it would be the duty of the House to congratulate her Majesty on the happy event—He would move that such an address should be presented on Wednesday, March the 3d.

Hon. JOHN ROSS said the Government had been induced to take no notice of the marriage of the Princess Royal, for the reasons mentioned by his hon. friend. This course had been well considered. Most likely, next mail would bring the required intimation, and he was sure every hon member would join in the address.

Hon Mr. DESBARATS said that the hon gentleman should consider that the official notice had not been received for a considerable time—It appeared to him that it was due to her Majesty to congratulate her at once on the event The Home Government had acted wisely in waiting the official notice, and allowing this House an opportunity to express its spontaneous feelings.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON said he should be inclined to follow the precedents of former occasions, and await what those were.

Hon Mr. ROSS said that it had been the custom to wait for the official notice.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON said that an address should, in his opinion, be immediately made—He thought the Council was standing upon a stepping-stone of etiquette to which they were not entitled.

Hon. Mr. MOORE thought it would be better to wait until an official communication was made. If the House did otherwise, they would be rather anticipating the Royal message.

Hon. Mr. DESBARATS then withdrew his motion.

ADDRESS IN REPLY TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER moved an Address to His Excellency in answer to his speech from the Throne. It was a mere echo of the Speech, no new feature appearing in it.

The hon gentleman said it differed somewhat from the non-committal speeches they had frequently had before. It committed the government to a certain course of action, particularly in relation to our commercial policy. He was delighted to see that the Government had taken into consideration the expediency of assimilating the commercial laws of Upper and Lower Canada, and also that of imprisonment for debt; a law which ought to be struck off the statute-book. The unavoidable casualties which occurred to commercial men, brought them to poverty, and the idea of shutting them up in prison, crushed out their energies and rendered them unable to retrieve their affairs. It was quite time that that law, which he could not call otherwise than barbarous, should be abrogated. He (Mr Moore) thought also that the law of partnership and assignments was extremely unjust. It was wrong to allow a man who perhaps owed ten or twelve merchants to take their property and assign it over to his friends, and to say that they should have the preference. The law in Lower Canada was much more just. It provided that every creditor should have the same advantages; that no advantage should be given to one over the other. He trusted that the same arrangement might be made in Upper Canada. He was also pleased to see that a correspondence had taken place with reference to an inter-colonial railway. It was a very important matter. The paragraph about the Grand Trunk Railway was also pleasing. He was quite sure the Grand Trunk would advance the interests of the Province more than any other enterprise, and when the Bridge across the St. Lawrence was completed we should then be able to understand what the railway had done for us. The hon. gentleman then said a few words about rapid legislation to remedy which he hoped the government was prepared to bring in a bill at an early period of the session.

Hon. Mr. PATTON seconded the motion. He regretted his hon. friend who had just sat down had not considered the address of his Excellency more in detail. That gentleman seemed to have had the impression that he (Hon. Mr. Patton) would; but it was physically impossible for him to do so. The first portion of the Speech referred to the mutiny in India, and the result, on he held in his hand said that the Council fully agreed with his Excellency in profound regret that our Eastern Empire should have been imperilled. We had all sympathised with the sufferings of our people, but could point with pride to the fact that, associated with the names of Havelock and Outram, was that of Inglis. He was the only British American subject who had assumed a very prominent position in the struggle, but there were many others who would, by the future historian, have their names placed on the roll of fame. His Excellency next referred to the disturbance of our commercial relations. But while we regretted that, we might take some credit to ourselves, for when the greatest commercial houses in the United States and in Europe had tottered and fallen, our banks had not been compelled to suspend payment in specie for one moment. In Canada alone, we had been able to maintain our ground. This would be, in the future, one of our proudest boasts, that here our banks did not give way to the pressure so much as they did in Great Britain, on the Continent, and in the United States; and he might say that, almost as a whole, our commercial men stood firm throughout this great and terrible crisis. The next paragraph spoke of assimilating the commercial laws of Upper to those of Lower Canada. Were had our laws assimilated, we might depend upon it that the sympathies which would spring up between one section of the Province and the other, would tend to lessen the jealousy which now existed. The laws of imprisonment for Debt and insolvency were to be taken into consideration. He was glad that a spirit of mercy had actuated the members of the Government; for last session he had to stand almost alone in advocating the repeal of the Insolvency Law. It was the duty of Government to legislate as much for the debtor as the creditor. The history of trade showed plainly that men, however well intentioned, might still get in difficulties, and that from the very nature of their occupations. With regard to fraudulent assignments, he was glad to find that the law was to be assimilated to that of Lower Canada. But it did not follow that, because preferential assignments were made, the debtor acted dishonestly, since there were many debts a man might contract, which in honour he was bound to pay, and by which he had been able to sustain his position for a lengthened time. He was also glad to see that we were to have an amendment to the Usury Law. It had been a very unsatisfactory position for a long time. The next paragraph referred to the registration of voters. During the last elections the most glaring frauds had been perpetrated, the result of gull-books being abstracted and falsified, of parties in charge of those poll-books deliberately taking false oaths, nominally under the sanction of the law. If such things could be permitted to take place by the law, it was a disgrace to the statute books—Another paragraph in the Speech referred to the opening of roads. There was no doubt that a well digested scheme for the settlement of land, would tend greatly to the benefit of the Province. Hold out proper inducements to settlers, let it be known that on their arrival here they would at once receive directions by which they could be sent to the locality they had chosen; that they would have roads over which they could travel, and they would, from the moment they arrived, feel an interest in the welfare of the Province In the Speech emigration was alluded to as having been "in excess" of that of the previous year He had looked at the report of the Chief Superintendent of Emigration, which appeared in the month of November The total number of emigrants who had arrived last year was 32,997, in the year 1856, 22,439, being an excess in favour of 1857, of 9,558, without reference to the emigration by way of New York, Boston, and other American ports Much of this emigration had been induced by steps taken by the hon. gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture, but the wholesome advice he had given had not been attended to. Men whose previous occupations and whose habits of life had unfitted them for the task of settlement, had come here in large numbers. If they had read any of the numerous treatises which had been circulated, they would have found that inducements were held out to only such persons as could come here and cut their way through the forests, or to those who could bring with them a small sum of money which would enable them to settle. Of that class not so many had emigrated as might have been supposed, but it was not so for the press of the country to turn round now and say that any had been induced to come here by false representations. The next portion of the address referred to the fisheries. What might be the meaning of the paragraph it was hard to say, but he hoped they would be dealt with in such a way as to render them remunerative. The fisheries were the most important channel to which, if properly dealt with, a large revenue might be derived from them. He was not aware of any official reports, but he had seen it stated in certain papers that the fisheries were worth £150,000 annually. At the same time it was stated that the Yankees were not in the habit of using a fish-hook. The finest catch was from Gaspe downwards, but it was either in the hands of fishermen from the United States, or from one of the sister colonies. He thought it would be well if her Majesty's Government were to devise a scheme to give to our fishermen an advantage over those of other countries. The ocean steamers were spoken of as having been successful, and a weekly line would shortly be established. Now if anything could tend to unite us with Great Britain, and loosen the ties which held us to the United States it would be these steamers. If by them a large stream of navigation would flow down the Grand Trunk Railway. He had read this morning in a certain newspaper (the Globe) the account of a passenger who had come over by a vessel belonging to the Black-ball line—[Hon gentlemen who would read that account would see that considerations of humanity did not enter into the minds of the owners of those vessels. If the facts were known, and they ought to be made known widely, the effect would be to turn the tide of emigration completely into the vessels of our own country. The next paragraph referred to the trade of the West. What would be the best course to take to cultivate that trade? We ought to have the whole commerce from Chicago, Green Bay, and Lake Superior, brought through this country—[He should like to see the Welland Canal deepened, and he hoped it would not be out of place to say, as allusion had been made to the favourable position of the Grand Trunk Railway, that the Northern Railway ought to receive serious attention. That Railway was the channel by which, in a commercial time, hinged the whole idea of shutting them up in prison, crushed out their energies and rendered them unable to retrieve their affairs. Hon. JOHN ROSS—Yes!

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON—The other point was the phrase which spoke of the Seat of Government It was a sort of by-way for bringing in Her Majesty's name. He had always been opposed to referring the question to the Queen; it was peculiarly one which they were called upon to decide themselves. A very unpleasant duty was imposed on her Majesty, but why should not the Government have come forward and said plainly that Ottawa had been chosen? It would be very ungracious treatment of her Majesty if her decision was now altered. There was another matter he wished to speak about. An hon. member of the Council had been appointed to the office of Receiver General—a very appropriate thing for him. He (Hon. Mr Fergusson) wished to know if he felt it proper to accept that office, though it was no doubt legal to accept it. He must tell the hon. gentleman, that, although he might get plenty of cash by the transaction, he would not get much credit. He dare not go to his constituents, for they would serve him as Cayley and Morrison had been served.

Hon. J. ROSS—Cayley has been elected by a majority of four hundred!

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON—Yes! he has gone to Heaven, and been elected there; but his old constituents, until more than well, there he was not unanimously. (The hon gentleman concluded with a sharp snap of his thumb.)

Hon. Mr. MORRIS said that it would not be impossible to discover fair ground for opposition to the resolution before the Committee, and as that was in view when the Speech itself was written, he must say that the end had been attained, and the writer was entitled to credit for his dexterity in the art of speech making. The Speech, however, would not give satisfaction to the people of the country, not on account of its contents, for really it contained little more than the promise of amendments to certain existing laws, and the narration of a few well known facts, which ought be looked upon as parts of the history of the country. But it was on account of the omission of all reference to the great questions of the day, that the Speech would prove unsatisfactory—on those omissions he would not then enter, as that which concerned the Council was the consideration of the resolution which was to constitute the Address to His Excellency the Governor General, and as that was with the exception of three words in the last paragraph, unobjectionable, he would at the proper time merely move that these words be expunged. The paragraph reads thus, "To thank His Excellency for his intimation that correspondence in relation to the Hudson's Bay Company and its territory will be laid before us." Now, what he (Mr M.) wanted was, to erase the words "Company and its," for he took it that no member of that House was prepared to admit directly or indirectly that the great North West Territory belonged to the Hudsons Bay Company. On the contrary he believed that the Council would unite with the people at large in claiming their undoubted right to the whole of that terr tor... He did not say that the Government had intentionally used language upon which a wrong construction might be put He did not say that the intimate feeling seemed to give to the Hudson Bay Company something to stand upon in their monstrous claim to the continued occupancy of a vast tract of that territory, but he did desire to call the attention of the representatives of the Government in that House to the impression which the correspondence had suggested, and he trusted they would consent to do so. If they did not, he believed they would regret it hereafter.

Hon. Col. PRINCE thought the expression was somewhat awkward, but he did not attach much importance to it. The words simply meant landed possessions. There was no great magic in the language, and it was only unnecessary to move any amendment. Upon the whole he liked the speech in bad omissions, it promised a great deal, and if the ministry could perform half what it had undertaken to do, they would deserve well of their country;—not well, but very well—True, was, he was, one great omission in the address. The Government had not mentioned Representation by Population. That question was exciting the minds of the thinking part of the community more than any other He would admit that in adventure there had been nothing to induce his Excellency to mention it, but he thought it would have been satisfactory to the people if it had been alluded to. The speech spoke of the railway in India; and in one part it seemed to him some distant allusion was made to the raising of a Canadian regiment.—Much had been said on that subject and he should feel it his duty at some future period of the session, to move for papers which might be passed with all speed. Cash and Canadian Governments. It he hoped that the officers would be chosen from men who were well known in this country. If officers who were not well known came here to raise men, the attempt would be a failure, the people would not serve under other than Canadian officers, because they had no confidence in strangers over them. He thought that while they had been laden at Portland taken through on to Collingwood. Now that the Grank Trunk was in such a condition that it could dispense with aid, the attention of the Government should be turned to the Northern Road, one of the greatest means of communication in this part, but as it was probable this might come up in another shape, he would not now make any more remarks about it. The trade of Chicago was spoken of as being of importance to Upper and Lower Canada. The principal trade consisted in flour, and it appeared that Chicago preserved from us no less than 25,000,000 of feet. The trade was alike profitable to Canadians and Americans. In the year 1854 only five vessels were employed in the trade; in the year 1856, there were 77, and last year one hundred and ten. He next alluded to the Welland Canal and the railway. The papers in reference to it were to be laid before the House. It was highly desirable that such a railway should be constructed. If we could be released from our loan of a million and a half, and expend it on making an independent railway, of course in connection with the Bridge across the St. Lawrence was completed we should then be able to understand result to Canada. The length would be 400 miles, and it was proposed that only one-fifth of the expense should be borne by Canada, the remainder being paid by the other colonies and the Home Government. If such an arrangement could be come to, we should have reason to rejoice that this matter had been brought under the notice of the Government. With regard to the last paragraph, which spoke of the Hudson's Bay Company, and said that papers would be laid on the table of this House, it was impossible to say anything until that was done. He hoped immediate action would be taken. It was very desirable that we should secure to Canada that immense trade which was now monopolized by the United States. In St. Paul, last year, furs were sold amounting to $180,000, and we might reasonably expect that if the trade were thrown open, Canada would be immediately benefitted. The sent of Government question was alluded to. He did hope most sincerely that the matter was buried once and for ever; although he judged from the press that such was not the case.—That question had been productive of most unseemly strife between one city and another. It had been referred to her Majesty for final decision, and although hon. gentlemen might be able to say a good deal about "clinching," he supposed no one would venture to suggest that the Queen had been actuated by any impure motive, or that she had any particular affection for Ottawa. His own opinion had been in favor of Toronto, but with regard to the general welfare and the future of Canada, and to what he believed was only a matter of time, a federal union of the Provinces, he thought it would be found that Ottawa was the best place of all others.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON said that the speech appeared to him to say little or nothing. It was a very ingenious speech, and it would be invidious in any member in the Opposition to attempt to contravene any part of it, but not having confidence in the present Cabinet, he felt more scrupulous than he should do in other circumstances. (Hear, hear.) He wished to know the exact meaning of the phrase which said we should not be called upon to render further aid to the Grand Trunk. Did that include the construction of the Victoria bridge?

Hon. JOHN ROSS—Yes!

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON—The other point was the phrase which spoke of the Seat of Government It was a sort of by-way for bringing in Her Majesty's name. If such an arrangement could be come to, we should have reason to rejoice that this matter had been brought under the notice of the Government. With regard to the last paragraph, which spoke of the Hudson's Bay Company, and said that papers would be laid on the table of this House, it was impossible to say anything until that was done. He hoped immediate action would be taken. It was very desirable that we should secure to Canada that immense trade which was now monopolized by the United States. In St. Paul, last year, furs were sold amounting to $180,000, and we might reasonably expect that if the trade were thrown open, Canada would be immediately benefitted. The sent of Government question was alluded to. He did hope most sincerely that the matter was buried once and for ever; although he judged from the press that such was not the case.—That question had been productive of most unseemly strife between one city and another. It had been referred to her Majesty for final decision, and although hon. gentlemen might be able to say a good deal about "clinching," he supposed no one would venture to suggest that the Queen had been actuated by any impure motive, or that she had any particular affection for Ottawa. His own opinion had been in favor of Toronto, but with regard to the general welfare and the future of Canada, and to what he believed was only a matter of time, a federal union of the Provinces, he thought it would be found that Ottawa was the best place of all others.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON said that the speech appeared to him to say little or nothing. It was a very ingenious speech, and it would be invidious in any member in the Opposition to attempt to contravene any part of it, but not having confidence in the present Cabinet, he felt more scrupulous than he should do in other circumstances. (Hear, hear.) He wished to know the exact meaning of the phrase which said we should not be called upon to render further aid to the Grand Trunk. Did that include the construction of the Victoria bridge?

Hon. JOHN ROSS—Yes!

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON—The other point was the phrase which spoke of the Seat of Government It was a sort of by-way for bringing in Her Majesty's name. He had always been opposed to referring the question to the Queen; it was peculiarly one which they were called upon to decide themselves. A very unpleasant duty was imposed on her Majesty, but why should not the Government have come forward and said plainly that Ottawa had been chosen? It would be very ungracious treatment of her Majesty if her decision was now altered. There was another matter he wished to speak about. An hon. member of the Council had been appointed to the office of Receiver General—a very appropriate thing for him. He (Hon. Mr Fergusson) wished to know if he felt it proper to accept that office, though it was no doubt legal to accept it. He must tell the hon. gentleman, that, although he might get plenty of cash by the transaction, he would not get much credit. He dare not go to his constituents, for they would serve him as Cayley and Morrison had been served.

Hon. J. ROSS—Cayley has been elected by a majority of four hundred!

Hon. Mr. FERGUSSON—Yes! he has gone to Heaven, and been elected there; but his old constituents, until more than well, there he was not unanimously. (The hon gentleman concluded with a sharp snap of his thumb.)

Hon. Mr. MORRIS said that it would not be impossible to could not but see that Her Majesty's Imperial Government [illegible] have a large standing force in this country, as the [illegible] of the report rendered that almost all her regular army should be drafted off, for active service, and therefore the [illegible] of the Province ought to be carefully looked to, for a paper constitution was [illegible] which was written, without an adequate force to protect it. In an address of so many paragraphs, it surely was not too much to expect that a line or two would be given on the state of the militia—especially after the Ministry had been so strongly recruited from the ranks of the militia. (Laughter.) However, [illegible] the gentlemen's speech and the accompanying correspondence in relation to the Hudson's Bay Company and the Territory would be laid before the House. If they could imagine such a thing as error slipping into a document of this kind, the sentence might be understandable. The Hudson's Bay Company and "its" Territory! Now, the Hudson's Bay Territory either meant that Territory which the Hudson's Bay Company claimed, or the Territory which his Excellency's advisers would show it was entitled to. The Government of the Hon. Attorney General West sent an embassy last year to the Imperial Government on this subject. They thought it was of so much importance that they took a Chief Justice from the Bench and sent him on a diplomatic mission to England. But important as the Government considered the matter, there was no other indication in the Address regarding it further than that certain correspondence would be laid before the House. From what had transpired in that correspondence it appeared that the Government of the hon. Attorney General—he spoke particularly to the hon. the Attorney General's Government, for in himself the Government seemed to be embodied—(laughter)—and if a vacancy occurred in the Cabinet the Government still went on, as was the case with the celebrated Government of the Duke of Wellington, which Cruikshank had immortalized by representing the figure of the Iron Duke as occupying what would otherwise have been nearly all empty chairs in his Cabinet Council Chamber—(laughter); the Government of the Hon. Attorney General had sent the Chief Justice to the Imperial Parliament. The Chief Justice himself said that he was sent to negotiate without having received instructions, and when asked for the boundaries of Canada he could not tell what the Canadian boundaries were. He had, however, a conception that it might be the 49th parallel, though he could by no means say that it was not further south or further north.—(Hear, hear.)

Hon. Mr. LORANGER.—What is the boundary?

Mr. McGEE replied that the boundary was defined at the peace in 1763, and what was Canada then could not be in Hudson's Bay Territory now. (Hear, hear.) * * * He now came to a matter somewhat peculiar to himself. He referred to the School question, and could not allow the occasion to go by without protesting against any apparent condemnation of the ecclesiastic (Bishop Charbonnel) who had acted in his sphere as he ought to have acted, in bringing the question of education before the House in the form in which his conscience told him he was bound to bring it forward. He had next to call attention to what he considered a serious imputation upon the Hon. gentleman at the head of the government.

Att'y. Gen. MACDONALD.—What is it?

Mr. McGEE.—It was this. There exists throughout Canada West, and in Montreal, and some other portions of Canada East, an institution which, as it appeared from the Gazette, was about to apply for an act of incorporation. It was called the Loyal Orange Institution. Certain members of the Government belonged to that association, among whom, as it appeared from an organ of the Government, (the Leader under another name—the Patriot.) (Laughter)—was the Hon. Attorney General—"Dear Brother" Macdonald.—(Much laughter.) That institution was the cause of more heart-burnings, public disturbances, and more bloodshed, (and yet they prided themselves upon having as) than any other body in the Province, their legal adviser one who ought to be the very perfection of order and decorum—the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government. (Hear.) He did not blame the head of the Government for all the unlawful acts of the Orange body; but he did say that the head of a ministry ought not to recognize a society which served as an insult to a large portion of the community, by recognitions addressed to its officers as friends and brethern; and he pledged himself when this subject came up to prove that it had been the constant desire and effort of the best statesmen in England to restrain this society. He should show, too, that Governors in this country, especially Sir F. B. Head, had been snubbed for the countenance they showed to it. No individual should be prevented from joining what society he pleased; but no man in high station should use it to insult large portions of the community. The few concluding words which he was about to utter would not be addressed to old members, familiar with the form of the Provincial Government almost since responsible government was established.—To those members he would but say, that they would find in what he should address to the House, the fearless expression of opinion founded on facts, and defended by such arguments as to his own mind should appear convincing. If it should be shown to him that his positions were wrong, instructed by superior information, he would never shrink from doing, that which was the next thing to being right—from correcting an unwitting error. To the new members he would say, it was evident that a new era had been reached in Canadian progress. Railways and other improvements had by the inevitable law of progress brought the country to a critical period, and the policy of the country must in his opinion be much more emphatic, hearty and manly than anything insinuated in that Speech which had only gone over Robin Hood's barn without ever entering the circle of a sound political proposition. States had been made great by great souls. Politics were not the tricks of a trade; but the great science of affairs—the science of Peace and War—the science which made small countries great, and could alone prevent their walls, like ivied ruins, from growing their walls, like ivied ruins, into the fields and pastures, where cattle had once grazed. It was a great spirit which made a great fortune in politics as in other departments, and he asked them who were beginners on the floor of that House, whether they would give their verdict to a mere make-shift policy, without compass, which therefore points nowhere, and which did not appeal either to the [illegible] of the country. The new members were making a beginning in the House. Other gentlemen had arrears with the public, for long years would its Reports, public [illegible] cannot [illegible] but the new members stood there free to begin their record.—They had to [illegible] their ship, and the first step should not be to vote for a country near a mile without substance, and for an address, which was the mere echo of an uncertain sound. He did not understand voting for a mere collection of empty words. For them he could shake an old dictionary or draw upon his memory; and for this reason he should decline to give his assent to the Address.

Mr. LORANGER.—I think, sir, the House will not take the character of the hon. member for Montreal, to get rid of the present Prime Minister, and put in his place a gentleman who was not named, but whose name we can readily imagine. If that gentleman, who came to this country with the project of spreading religious prejudices comes to us French Canadians with the hope of carrying out his purpose, he will find that his words have no echo among us; and we tell the gentleman once for all, that we hate Catholic fanaticism just as much as we hate Protestant fanaticism. The gentleman has said that he could give me lessons in geography, I conceive that he may have pretensions to do so for he has travelled a great deal, and it seems he has no great affection to any place, if we may judge from the short time he has stayed in any one of them. He has spoken of the missionary in Huron and Bruce, but I should think he must have felt a great deal of sympathy for that traveller. The Grillin Town traveller should extend his fellowship to the other traveller. The hon member has also asserted that the Speech was obscure. I think it is the hon. gentleman who is short sighted. However he has criticized, though he does not understand it; for he has come here for that purpose.—Then he said that in speaking of trade he did so independently for that he owed Montreal nothing. Of course any body knew about that. But after all he has entered into large speculations, as if he was very well read on the subject, and indeed in one way I think the gentleman has been a trader, though what he said upon the subject of ordinary commerce was characterized like the rest of his remarks by an abundance of nothing. He has also said that the Government made a great mistake in not speaking of the militia. The military taste of the gentleman seems to be great, although his enthusiasm was got up at a very short notice, since he has only been here I think for some short two months.

A VOICE.—Six months.

Mr. LORANGER.—Well, six months, it makes little difference. Then the hon. gentleman has alleged that the Government dared to send a Chief Justice to England without instructions, and that before the House of Commons Committee, the Chief Justice could not say where the line of Upper Canada was drawn. But when I asked the hon. gentleman if he could say, he replied, yes—that the treaty of 1763 defined it.—Now the hon. gentleman may have great geographical knowledge of other countries, but I can tell him that in this country there is no line drawn between Rupert's Land and Canada. If he thinks he has made a great discovery as to what Canada was in 1763, he is greatly mistaken, for the treaty of Paris gives the line from River St. Johns to Lake Nepissing, and thence down to Lake Champlain, leaving more than half Canada; and what the Chief Justice said was, that he did not know the line, because no body knew it.

Mr. McGEE said, what he meant to convey was, that the Chief Justice had stated that he did not know the line which the Government and people of Canada would be prepared to accept; not having any instructions on the subject.

Hon. LORANGER.—Well, I stated the substance of what the hon. gentleman has said, and I have proved to the member that perhaps I could give him some lessons in geography, though I have not seen many parts of the world which he has visited.—The hon. member had also spoken of the law for abolishing imprisonment for debt; but he thought the hon. member should not complain of that. A man who had no moveables could have nothing seized but himself, and of course those who had moveables were not in that predicament. The hon. member spoke of the Hudson Bay Territory. He has taken a broad notion, that all the country belongs to Canada, and then he asks why the Chief Justice did not claim the whole? But there is a large part of this territory which does not belong to Canada, and if it does not belong to the Company from the invalidity of the charter, it must revert to Great Britain. There is another point, as to the part of the Hudson's Bay territory called the disputed territory, which I hold belongs to Canada, and which she claims. But as long as that was not the question before the House, this gentleman, who has only been in the country two or three months, has no right to find fault with everything he finds here—with our institutions—our commerce—our documents. He is a new member, and being so let him act as such, and not give lessons to every one—to Ministers of the Crown, and to his colleagues, as if, instead of being a new member, he had fallen from the clouds, all endowed for preaching.

Mr. SCATCHERD moved the adjournment of the debate, which being carried, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 9, 1858.

The £50,000 Road By-Law.

Mr. Sheridan has at last ventured out before the rate-payers with his By-Law to raise £50,000 for the construction of certain leading Gravel Roads. The Peterborough Review is alone selected for this publication, first, because it is the paper of the least account, and, secondly, because its editor sells his independence for the price of Mr. Sheridan's patronage. We learn by looking over this By-Law to estimate the amount of expedient deceit the editor of the Review can practice, when his master requires it. When the By-Law first passed, the County Council we remarked that its passage by the Rate-payers was to be calculated according to Municipalities and not according to plurality of votes. This statement was flatly and pointedly contradicted in the next Review, yet in the body of the By-Law we find these words; "And be it further enacted that the vote upon the By-Law shall be by municipalities and taken in the same manner as for the election of Councillors, majority of municipalities to decide." But why was the lying contradiction given when truthful notice? It was because the party who are getting up this scheme—Messrs. Sheridan, Conger, & Co.—know well the dissatisfaction it would give if it was known that a quantity united Township should have an equal vote to the united wards of populous Peterborough. So the Review did flatly deny itself and deluded the truth, but he publishes his contradiction, because the published By-Law to be good for anything must be a correct copy, otherwise that passage would not see the light. There is a studied silence now concerning this scheme in the columns of the Review, and it is because the conspirators hope to secure its passage before the public sentiment is awakened to it. The whole matter lies in a nutshell, Mr. Sheridan will make £2000 or £3000 by passing it through his hands, and taking the toll the law allows him, besides having a large sum lying to his credit at the Commercial Bank, which he knows how to keep moving. Mr. Conger, who is out of business now, would get himself appointed Commissioner by the Council, and another £1500, like what he fleeced from the town of Peterboro, upon the pretence of using that sum secretly to their advantage, will be taken and multiplied upon the County, and when the £50,000 is spent, those roads which are not finished, as they never are upon the first estimate, will demand a further levy, all the while that the folks on the much travelled roads near the town will go to assist the sickly concerns at a distance and where there are few people. Then there are portions laid down in the By-Law which will never be made unless at the expense of all the others; taking for instance the bridging of Mud Lake or Pigeon Lake, we know by the bridge on Rice Lake that an ordinary structure will not stand the action of the ice, then how is it that Pigeon Lake and Mud Lake are to be operated upon. But of course this is all foreseen and Emmismore will be flattered into voting, upon an understanding, while when the vote is taken the promise will be got rid of and difficulties piled up in bar. So Emmismore will be sold and yet have to pay toll on coming to Peterboro. The scheme is so barefaced an attempt to make the County of Peterborough speculate in expenditure, for the wire-pullers behind the scene to collect their toll, that the organ of the manufacturers does not dare openly to advocate it. The day upon which the ratepayers are to take the matter into their consideration and decide upon it, is Wednesday, 24th March instant, when, if they know their own advantage, they will teach Messrs. Conger, Sheridan & Co to mind their own business, without interfering with what need not concern them.

The vacant Bench.

These Counties are still without a Judge. We have a rumor that persistent efforts are being made to persuade Mr. MacDonald to appoint a Barrister out of these Counties, who is an applicant in Charity, he being from intemperance and other worthlessness incapable of earning a living in the practice of his profession. A cabinet minister, only lately selected, is understood to be urgent in his demands upon Mr. MacDonald, for the appointment to be made in behalf of his nominee. We desire to be satisfied with the appointment Mr. MacDonald said makes, but in order to be so, Mr. MacDonald is expected to consult the permanent interest of these Counties; and we hope he will withstand all the efforts that are being made, even from so high a quarter as one of his cabinet, to disgrace us by putting our judicial business under the control of a decayed town. That there is a difficulty in the mind of the Attorney General is quite plain in the fact that with the material at command and self-suggesting, no decision has as yet been come to. In view of this circumstance, however, there is good ground for believing that Mr MacDonald is only weighing the public claims of the respective applications, and other things being equal, he will without doubt, entertain the preference of the judicial district for a party who has long resided in it.

Mr. George Tate Corrected.

A communication similar to that which appeared in last week's Port Hope Guide and Peterborough Review, over the signature of "George Tate" and dated Feb. 25th, 1858, was sent to this office for publication. It is always our intention to give parties of whatever side, an opportunity of vindicating themselves or correcting errors in disputed questions, but before this privilege can be recognized, it must be presumed that the obliged party will at least keep that faith with us as not to lead us to publish what he knows to be wilfully false. In the matter of Mr. Tate's communication, we have to remark that it seldom happens that so barefaced a fraud is directed through the press; we say it advisedly that Mr. Tate in representing, as he does throughout his letter, that he is the partner of Mr. John Fowler, in the construction of the branch line of the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway, does so with the full knowledge that it is wilfully false. It is painful to make this announcement, but it is a duty we owe to the press and ourselves to make an example of his case, and to guard others from entering upon such dangerous ground as he has trod. In vindication of this charge we have as proof that Mr. George Tate did on the nineteenth day of January, 1858, in presence of Mr. Thos. C. Clarke of Port Hope, deliver to Mr. John Fowler, a sealed instrument, for a consideration which he therein acknowledges to have received, utterly and absolutely separating himself from all connection with the construction of the said branch railway, and leaving it entirely to Mr. John Fowler, as though he had been from the beginning the sole party of the part contracting and covenanting with the Port Hope, Lindsay and Beaverton Railway Company in the said matter. And having had this document before us, it remains only for us to say to Mr. George Tate, that his signature will not in future authenticate any statement he may make to us, that is not otherwise sufficiently verified and authenticated. With this notice persons reading Mr. Tate's letter will know what value to set upon it.

☞We have drawn largely on the debates in Parliament this week, because the subjects are interesting and the House of Assembly being new, it will afford our readers an early acquaintance with its spokesmen. Mr. McGee's speech is put by itself, it will stand alone for its oratory and good sense, and we beg to congratulate the House upon the possession of a master who, if it has a proper respect for itself, must soon work a most beneficial change upon the ordinary character of the debates.

The Port Hope Band.

It might be supposed, from the extraordinary notice given of the performance of the Port Hope band, in Peterboro', last week, by the Peterboro' Review, that their conduct had been offensive to its inhabitants; we saw nothing of the party, but having been induced, by the unusual style of the notice in the Review to fill positions, to make enquiries, we find that the richness in that article is not due to the subject of its attack, but only to the reflection of the mind of the writer. The performances were highly patronized, but we cannot see that the band is to be responsible, on that account, and therefore offer them the apology for the imperfections they have exhibited.

Incendiarism.

We regret to hear that a barn on the property of Mr. Patrick Leahy, in Douro, was set on fire on Friday evening last about eight o'clock, when the building was entirely consumed with its contents, consisting of about 700 bushels of Wheat, a large quantity of Oats and Hay. Seven large pigs were burned to death along with some calves and a number of sheep. The horses were barely saved. Mr Leahy tells us that there is no doubt but that the fire was caused by an incendiary.

The Presentation to Dr. Lavell.

To THE REV. WM. SCOTT,

SIR,—In a report of the proceedings had at a Soiree given in honour of Dr Lavell, on the occasion of his removal to Kingston, your name appears as the principal person in the presentation of a complimentary address to the guest of the evening: and also as the author of a resolution "that the editors of the Peterborough Review and the Toronto Canadian Guardian be respectfully requested to publish the proceedings of this meeting, and that the editors of Kingston papers be earnestly requested to copy the same." Why this distinction in the manner of addressing yourself to these editors, it is not for me to enquire, as I am not of them, but such separations are not commonly made without cause, the collective form being the readier way. But leaving such questions to the minds of those whom they concern, I beg to draw your attention to the extraordinary character of the address itself, and to be allowed to say, as one of the community from whom it purports to proceed, first, that it was not the result of an organized effort "wherein all classes of the community, all shades of opinion and the members of the various churches" had an opportunity of expressing their sentiments. The meeting was held in the building attached to the Wesleyan Methodist Church, a circumstance which is carefully suppressed in the report, and that selection was not by arrangement with committees from other bodies, or with the concerted action of the bodies themselves. That Soiree, which your published proceedings would magnify into a general movement among all classes of the community, was confined in its organization, in its management, and in its attendance, to some members of the church over which you preside in Peterboro, and were there wanting external evidence of such its character, the omission is amply supplied by the second paragraph of the complimentary address which was then delivered. Your language is reported to have been—"Whether we consider you as identified with a particular section of the Christian Church." Is that the language which could be expected to proceed from a collection of the "members of the various churches" you pretend to have congregated together? Would you in such an assembly have asked a concordance in an expression that was calculated to awaken the spirit of strife which is so difficult to suppress where religious doctrine and discipline are subjects of contemplation, or is it not in truth that you felt while you were drawing on the credit of the community at large, you were applying the proceeds to "your section of the Christian Church" in particular?

But, Sir, it is not alone to the evident intention of making the act of a few appear the will of the many that I object, there is something in the language of the address which I am satisfied could not have been passed in such a congregation of persons from "the various churches" which you would have strangers believe were then collected. Is it possible that a Christian minister could adopt such a sentence as this: "Consistent and energetic as a Christian, skilful and successful as a Physician, talented and eloquent as a speaker and Chairman of public meetings, it will be impossible for any one individual to fill the vacancy which your departure occasions." I ask you seriously, sir, is your faith so weak as to refuse you to believe that Dr. Lavell's equal may yet be found upon earth? And I ask you further, sir, whether you feel justified in claiming the faith of a Christian while giving expression to such a sentiment? Chairman of public meetings! When was Dr. Lavell the chosen chairman of a public meeting? Not in Peterboro, unless at those meetings of organized societies at which the public are admitted as visitors; but at a public meeting in its true sense, such at which every citizen feels himself at home, Dr. Lavell was never, I believe, called to preside.

To conclude, Sir, I may express my regret at having to dispute the character with which you have chosen to enshroud the subject of your eulogy, and I do so because I believe that he is not naturally repulsive; but I feel that the attempt you have made, to give of him a false description, is calculated to lower him in the estimation of unreflecting persons. And I desire, too, that the religious portion of this community may be freed from all participation in the unchristian sentiment which you have thought proper to express of the dispensing power of Providence.

Leaving it to the editors of Kingston papers to do as they are desired with your certificate, and hoping that Dr. Lavell may succeed better in procuring a recognition of his professional talent there, than he has done during the four years of grace that have won him the rewards of supernatural excellence in your mind,

I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

X.

The County Printing.

WALTER SHERIDAN, ESQ.,

SIR,—It is much the pleasanter way, when it can be done in mutual satisfaction, for persons, even in public situations, to conduct their correspondence under the concealment of an envelope. You did me this honor, when you enclosed a blank form, to be completed as a tender for the printing of the Counties' Council. There was however, a vagueness in that communication which I desired removed, because, while it remained, I was uncertain with what amount of faith I could receive the words of my correspondent. I addressed you with that view, after the same fashion that you introduced yourself to me, but with an openness which could have left you in no doubt about my meaning. You could not have regarded my desire for information as impertinent, or my manner of asking it unusual, nevertheless, although you acknowledge to have it in your power to satisfy me by a direct answer, you avoid me by answering a question of your own raising. You are a man of method, Mr. Sheridan, and, under ordinary circumstances, would prefer to be understood with explanations can be made without injury, because without disappointment, and you know how much annoyance can be saved, by men proposing to do business together, understanding the terms of their dealing and the points of issue so far as they are foreseen that can arise.

You wrote to me on March 1st, 1858, as follows:

Examiner Office,
Peterboro', March 1, 1858.

W. SHERIDAN, Esq., Treasurer and Clerk:

SIR,—I received your application of March 1 for printing tenders to-day, and beg you to explain whether the last paragraph, viz: "Tenders in the enclosed form will be received till noon on Monday the 15th March instant" means that the tenders will be opened at that hour, and the lowest accepted, or what?

I am, Sir, your ob't Servant,
A. SAWERS.

P. S.—A written answer is requested.

And this reasonable application received the following answer from you, March 4, 1858:

Examiner Office,
Peterboro', March 4th, 1858.

SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 3rd inst. I beg to inform you that the blank form of tender sent you is the same as furnished each printer in these United Counties. If you tender for the Printing and Assessment Rolls, &c., please fill up the blanks and send it at some convenient time before noon on Monday, the 15th of March instant, as none will be received after that hour, and it will be treated according to the instructions I have from the Counties' Council, in common with all others of the same form.

I am, Sir, your obed't Servant,
WALTER SHERIDAN,
Clerk and Treasurer.

A. SAWERS, Esq., Examiner Print, Peterboro'.

On receipt of that letter, recollecting the ship you gave me last year, to prevent my giving a tender, and to secure the printing for Mr. White at his own prices, I felt that the want of certainty in regard to the disposal of the tenders after their receipt, was not an ordinary oversight, but that it was done with the purpose of enabling you to accept or reject them without reference to the advantage of the ratepayers of the Counties, and without respect to the claims of the parties tendering to the good faith of the officer acting for the Council.

I then wrote you as under, March 3, 1858:

A. SAWERS, Esq., Examiner Print, Peterboro'.

Is it possible that you could not have understood the object of my enquiry, or is it a result of your long official connection with the mysteries of diplo nacy that causes you to shy off from the straight and take the crooked course? I said you are a man of method, Mr. Sheridan. Are these letters to be taken as a sample of your ordinary official dealings? If they are, the less business you have to transact for the Counties the better for them. I will tell you, (tho' I must excuse myself for relating to you what you already know, by the explanation that I am addressing the people through you) that the consequence of your making these transactions obscure, would seem to encourage a system of bribery, it would seem to invite a sweetener from the parties tendering to the Clerk that will awaken an interest towards them. And consequently would create among honorable competitors who disdain such unworthy actions, a disgust towards doing business with the public offices, which is highly injurious to the public interests. I am a ratepayer, Mr. Sheridan, and I feel an interest in the expenditure of the moneys that are exacted from me as a contribution for the government I enjoy. Singly, the misapplication of an assessment is of little public concern, but there are a number of ratepayers and their contributions collected together form a large fund, and its disposal is raised in importance as its bulk increases. You are just now proposing that, besides the regular and ordinary tax, a special rate should be struck, to cover the interest and provide for the repayment of £50,000, to be borrowed on the credit of the County of Peterborough, and expended, after passing through your hands, in the construction of gravel roads, and bridges. Allow me to tell you, Mr. Sheridan, that if, as I believe it will happen, the vote on the By-Law by the ratepayers is adverse to the scheme, its destruction will be more owing to the want of confidence the ratepayers have in the controllers of their common property, than to the want of appreciation in the intrinsic merits of the scheme itself. You have been long in the enjoyment of your post as custodian of the public records of the municipality and treasurer of its moneys. You have made good use of your time, and turned your opportunities to good account. When you first entered upon your duties in the Court House, you were not charged with the possession of much of this world's goods; you were accepted as one who in his ambition for higher rewards had neglected the opportunities which lead to the comforts of the world; and being respected in your habits of self-denial, your salary was put upon a scale of equality with your daily wants. It was not long, however, before your latent disposition to accumulate, discovered itself, and the frugal existence which rewarded the management of your own labor, became converted into sumptuous entertainment, in the management of the produce of the labor of the people. From being the impersonification of improvidence, as it is applied in its wordly sense by worldly minded people who take an earthly view of riches, you soon appeared, in rivalry of the Marquis of Carrabas, surveying from the observatory on the proud summit of your castle, the terraces, the courts, and the grain fields of which you had become possessed, only varying the pleasant contemplation by an occasional diversion in the way of accommodating a defaulter, upon the reference of your banker, with the temporary use of your account, to be repaid with an increase equal to the necessities of the applicant. Such changes as these, Mr. Sheridan, are not produced without a cause, and they are not witnessed without making an impression. How necessary this, then, that you should throw every guard around your virtue that it shall withstand the shocks a wicked world is ever ready to direct against the honor of uncommon excellence. The spirit of your dealing as displayed in your letters is rather calculated to confirm than remove the unpleasant sensation with which your pro-By-Laws of 1857, the printer to take copy or pay for copying, and be responsible for the proof.—It will be necessary to tender for other Printing also, such as fly-sheets in hand-bill form, and lists of Convictions; Notices and publications in newspapers for the first and subsequent insertions with the usual discount taken off. The Assessors and Collectors Rolls per quire, Notices of Towns and Townships per quire, Schedule of do. to fill up per quire and Directions to Assessors. Tenders in the enclosed form will be received till noon on Monday, the 15th March inst.

I am, Sir, your ob't Servant,
WALTER SHERIDAN,
Treasurer and Clerk.

A. SAWERS, Esq., Examiner Print, Peterboro'.

On receipt of that letter, recollecting the ship you gave me last year, to prevent my giving a tender, and to secure the printing for Mr. White at his own prices, I felt that the want of certainty in regard to the disposal of the tenders after their receipt, was not an ordinary oversight, but that it was done with the purpose of enabling you to accept or reject them without reference to the advantage of the ratepayers of the Counties, and without respect to the claims of the parties tendering to the good faith of the officer acting for the Council.

I then wrote you as under, March 3, 1858:

Examiner Office,
Peterboro', March, 3, 1858.

W. SHERIDAN, Esq., Treasurer and Clerk:

SIR,—I received your application of March 1 for printing tenders to-day, and beg you to explain whether the last paragraph, viz: "Tenders in the enclosed form will be received till noon on Monday the 15th March instant" means that the tenders will be opened at that hour, and the lowest accepted, or what?

I am, Sir, your ob't Servant,
A. SAWERS.

P. S.—A written answer is requested.

And this reasonable application received the following answer from you, March 4, 1858:

Examiner Office,
Peterboro', March 4th, 1858.

SIR,—In reply to your letter of the 3rd inst. I beg to inform you that the blank form of tender sent you is the same as furnished each printer in these United Counties. If you tender for the Printing and Assessment Rolls, &c., please fill up the blanks and send it at some convenient time before noon on Monday, the 15th of March instant, as none will be received after that hour, and it will be treated according to the instructions I have from the Counties' Council, in common with all others of the same form.

I am, Sir, your obed't Servant,
WALTER SHERIDAN,
Clerk and Treasurer

PATENT

ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, and will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials, and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical cementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undenisably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to be distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate; forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the finest polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Pots, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, seeking further information, addressed [post-paid] to the Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

Provincial Parliament.

House of Assembly.

THURSDAY, March 4, 1858.

Mr. SHORT next rose. He said that as this was an occasion in which there was an opportunity of going more generally into the affairs of the country, he would take the liberty of making some observations. He would endeavour to analyse what was contained in the reply to the Address of His Excellency. The House had now got as far as the third clause in that reply, and were then told that much might be done to improve the commercial legislation of the country. But we had yet to learn whether anything was to be done. The Inspector General had made an explanation, and had stated that there were three measures which he thought would relieve the country from its financial difficulties. One of these was the promotion of emigration, but how the benefit which we were to derive from these measures was to be brought about, we had not been told. No doubt the Hon. Inspector General (as the member from Baldimand said) had not got his measures prepared yet, having had so much to do. But it was necessary to consider this emigration, which it was proposed to draw into the country. True, emigration was a great benefit, as it brought capital into the country, both in the shape of money and labour. But it was very necessary that the country should be in such a state as to be able to give employment to the labour which would be so advantageous to it, and he believed the House and the country would both agree with him when he said, that we were not in a position when that labour could be profitably employed. He believed he was right, when he said that there were a large number of mechanics and labourers who had left their homes, who were previously comparatively well off, but who were now in want and destitution. It was not because they were unwilling to labour, but because they could not find it, because the state of the country was such that employment was not to be had. But though the country was much depressed, still there was great reason to be proud of the position we held in a commercial point of view,—our banks having stood alone on the American continents. That position had not been kept without much suffering, and it would have been well if the Inspector General, instead of wandering about looking for a constituency from Dan to Berlsheba, had been preparing measures which would relieve the country from the crisis with whic it had been visited (Hear, hear.) That improvement should be found for the labourers it was necessary there should be money to pay them. To the condition of the usury laws, much of the commercial depression was attributable. It was not to be expected our banks should lend money at six per cent. while they had to pay ten per cent. for it themselves. The Government ought to come down prepared with measures to meet the emergency, and not without measures as they are at present. But not only had they left the country without measures, they had also left it, for a considerable time, without a Government, so that it was not to be wondered at, that when there was no Government, there should be no policy. During the interval of pressure, every prudent man had economised his expenditure; but there was nothing in the Address about that retrenchment which the country was so loudly demanding. There had not been an election in Upper Canada in which retrenchment was not one of the planks in the platform of the candidates. The expenditure was rapidly increasing; but there had been no new policy initiated by what was called a new Government. It was customary in England—and members very frequently quoted British precedents—to foreshadow ministerial intentions at the opening of Parliament, but the House had been sitting six days, and they were now just as ignorant of what the Government intended doing, as they were at the commencement of the session. If the hon. Inspector General had been as diligent in the service of the country as he had been busy in securing his election, the House might hope to have been placed in possession of the figures showing the financial position of the country. The hon. member for Carleton last night stated that he was prepared to support the Government right or wrong; but for his part he had not any such confidence in the Administration, and he was sure that nine-tenths of the people of Upper Canada would bear him out in saying that due economy had not been exercised in regard to the public expenditure at a time when retrenchment was loudly called for. But the recent election had brought about a change such as the hon. gentleman on the other side were little prepared for, and which they little expected when they lately dissolved Parliament so hastily, and he hoped that before long the financial affairs of the Province would be much better administered than they had hitherto been. The Address alluded to the assimilation of the commercial laws of Upper Canada to those of Lower Canada, and it would be well indeed if there was union of the Provinces, not in name only, but in reality, (hear, hear.) It would be well if the laws could be so assimilated that those who imposed the heavy burdens upon the country under which it groaned were made to bear them. However, he expected little from the Government with regard to the assimilation of the commercial laws. The late Government was, it was said, composed of nine lawyers and an auctioneer, and therefore did contain one business man; but the present Government was composed of ten lawyers, and these were the men who were to assimilate the commercial laws and manage the commercial affairs of the country! (hear, hear.) Though I would not wish it to be understood of hon. gentlemen opposite, it was often said to be the interest of lawyers to complicate the laws, and he thought it dangerous that the business of law making should be solely left in the hands of lawyers. The merchants, farmers, and mechanics of Canada, were unrepresented in the Cabinet. The President of the Bureau of Agriculture was a lawyer; the hon. gentleman who had to look after the letters was a lawyer; and they had been told that whenever the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. Cayley) had been in power for any length of time, the Province had been brought to the very verge of bankruptcy, (hear, hear.) Mention was also made in the Address to a law of insolvency, but if the bankruptcy law which had been already passed had been carefully and properly framed, we should now have no need of such a measure. He was glad, however, to know that in one thing the Ministry had redeemed their promises—he referred to the statement that no more aid would be given to the Grand Trunk Railway. What he complained most of was, the paucity of the Address, and that one of the most important of all questions had been omitted from it. That question was Representation by Population, (hear, hear.) This had taken deep hold of the minds of the people of Upper Canada, and the Postmaster General himself knew very well that he would not have been elected for West Northumberland, had he not pledged himself to support that measure, (hear, hear.) In the county of Peterborough, which he (Mr. Short) had the honour to represent, Mr. Cauger, the late member, was rejected because he had opposed this measure, and he would warn the Postmaster General that such would be his fate if he failed in redeeming his pledge to support a measure for making the Representation in accordance with Population, even though he were again to attempt to tin down his constituency by promises of a large pecuniary benefit. Why should the western portion of the Province occupy the degraded position in which she now found herself placed, with one in four of her population not at all represented! (Hear, hear.)

Hon. Mr. SICOTTE—What a pity.

Mr. SHORT—The Hon. Inspector General says it is a pity. But it is true; and the Postmaster General has pledged himself that he would not be a member of a Government who would not carry out the principle.

Hon. Mr. SICOTTE—I tell the hon. gentleman that it is not true, and I further say that he knows it is not true.

Mr. SHORT—I repeat that the Postmaster General promised at the polls and elsewhere that he would vote for Representation according to Population, and that he was prepared to carry out the principle at all hazards—whether he was a member of the Government or not. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. FOLEY—I wish, with the permission of the hon. member for Peterborough, to put a question to the hon. member for West Northumberland. Does the Postmaster General pretend to say that the statement made in a resolution passed by an Orange Lodge, of which he is a member, is not true? In that resolution it is stated that the Hon. Postmaster General pledged himself to support Representation by Population. Is it true, or is it not?

Hon. Mr. SMITH—What does the hon. gentleman know about the resolution passed by the Orange Lodge? Was he there? (Cries of Oh, oh!)

Mr. SHORT said a strong argument for Representation by Population was contained in the fact that according to the best data Upper Canada contributed £3 to every £1 contributed by Lower Canada. He believed Upper Canada would not long quietly submit to such injustice, and that if she could not get her just rights in any other way it would be necessary to dissolve the Union. (Hear, hear.) He should regret to see this, and he thought no one would have more reason to regret it than the Lower Canadian members who he trusted would doubt, they could to prevent it by giving the Upper Province its just rights. Mr. Short proceeded to reply to the charge made against the Opposition of raising a No-Popery cry. He believed that some hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side had used the No-Popery cry themselves to get seats. Had not the Postmaster General, in seeking re-election, attempted to cast odium on the Opposition by dwelling against the Roman Catholic Canadiens of the member for Montreal (Mr. Mercier)? The hon. gentleman no doubt equally weighed against the Opposition for their connection with the other member for Montreal and his friends, whom he described as dangerous men, revolutionists and republicans, belonging to the class of men, who introduced the guillotine into old France. But the hon. gentleman did not say that his colleague who sat beside him had manifested very strong propensities to annex Canada to the Republic lying south of the line of 45. Though much afraid of the men whom he identified with the republicans of Old France, he was quite willing to have as a colleague one who sought to throw us into the arms of our shrieking neighbours, (laughter.) The hon. member then referred to the Separate School question. He considered that carrying out the Separate system would be ruinous to our educational interests. Educating the children of the country, separately, under the influence of different religions, would lead to the perpetuation of strife and jealousies, and bickerings. If we were to have a great future, these should be done away with, and the education of all the youth of the country in common, would contribute greatly to that result. He hoped the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Ferguson) would strenuously oppose the motion of which he had given notice for the abolition of Separate Schools. (Hear, hear.)

PRIVILEGE AND THE GLOBE.

MONDAY, March 8.

Mr. PICHE, complaining of an editorial article in the Globe of Saturday last, as reflecting on his character as a member of the House, moved that said article be read at the table by the Clerk.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Do I understand the member to bring this up as a question of privilege?

Mr. PICHE.—Yes!

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman had better read the article himself, and shew how he had been complained of. If this motion were permitted, any hon. gentleman might rise and move to have any number of newspaper articles read.

Hon. Mr. MORIN said that he could shew a precedent for this course in the House of Commons, in 1841. He then read a rule of the House of Commons, which stated that if any member had to complain of an article in a newspaper, he might propose a motion to read the paper.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD thought before having anything read, the hon. member should make out a case.

Hon. Mr. SICOTTE shook his head.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD—Oh, I see the hon. Commissioner of Crown Lands shakes his head. Well then the Address will not be got through for a twelvemonth.

Hon. J. A. MACDONALD—The hon. member for Cornwall is wrong. I see by a precedent in 1848 that when a member complained in this way, the paper was handed by the Speaker, who said the paper must first be read.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD—Well, then, I shall move to read the Message in amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE—I second the amendment.

Mr. GALT hoped the hon. member [Mr. Piche] would not press his motion. By the time he had been as long in political life as others, he would not be so sensitive about attacks by the Press. Every hon. gentleman must feel that the hon. member had cause to feel resentment, but he should consider that it was in some respects a flattering thing that he should be attacked by a paper so prominent as the Globe. (Laughter.) The House would of course universally admit the impropriety of such an attack, but having once brought the matter before the House, he had better not press it.

Mr. JOHN CAMERON also urged the hon. gentleman to withdraw his motion. For himself he did not care for any attack which might be made upon him. He meant to pursue fearlessly the course he had chalked out for himself. He hoped the time of the House would not be wasted by reading newspaper articles.

Mr. TACHÉ said that the member for Cornwall was wrong. No article that was not a breach of privilege could be read. It was pretended that this was a thing to be laughed at. But it was a serious thing for a young man coming into life to be accused of being sold.

Mr. FOLEY said that if this accusation against individuals was to occupy the time of the House, certainly the charges against the body ought to have some attention. Now the Leader had accused the whole Opposition of being purchasable at the rate of £300 a-piece.

Mr. SHERWOOD maintained that the Globe could hurt no one, and thought the thing had better drop. He felt, on this occasion, something like the old forwarder in the New Brunswick Legislature, whose first act was to restrain forwarders, who, he said, he knew to be very hard cases, from having been a long time a forwarder.

The SPEAKER then put the question, and declared that the yeas had it.

Mr. BROWN wished to make a remark before the question was discussed. If they were to commence this system of bringing newspaper editors to the bar, they were entering on a course to which it was difficult to see the end.—He had not the slightest objection to this article being read, but he wished to suggest the position in which such a proceeding would place the House. He apprehended it was quite unparliamentary to produce a loose paper, never formally presented to the House in any way, and ask it to be read. But, if the hon. gentleman wished to proceed, let him do so. He had no doubt the writer of the article would be prepared to appear at the bar and explain his reasons for making the statements he did—for his part he did not know who the writer was. If hon. gentlemen were determined to have it, let there be a committee to have the matter fairly investigated. And let other matters be, connected with the late election be enquired into. If statements on the one side were enquired into, statements on the other side must be enquired into also. Hon. gentlemen opposite had better let the matter alone.

Hon. Mr. CAMERON did not admire the way in which members were attacked by the newspapers, but he did not think such attacks should be noticed in the House. If they were, a great deal of time would be taken up. The extraordinary charges had lately been brought in any newspaper. In the Minerve the other day there was a gross charge against the Attorney General East. That hon. gentleman was there accused of having declared in the House, with his own mouth, that he was the most corrupt man in it. And the member for Terrebonne (Mr. Morin) was accused of having spoken strongly in favor of granting more aid to the Grand Trunk. Several arguments to that effect were put in the hon. gentleman's mouth, although in point of fact he had spoken strongly against any such course. (Hear, hear.) But the worst accusation was against Mr. Cartier, who was made to charge himself with being the most corrupt man in the House, and it was the more cruel that it proceeded from a paper supporting the Government. (Laughter.) It gave a man too much influence and prominence to drag him before the bar of the House. In one Parliament, they punished returning-officers, and this gave them so much notoriety, that, in the next, they became members of Parliament. (Hear, hear.) That was at least one instance of proceedings taken against returning officers in last Parliament.

Mr. DUNKASE also urged the withdrawal of the motion, as they had the acknowledgment of the member for Waterloo, and the member for Toronto, that the articles in question were not serious.

Mr. BROWN—Not at all.

Mr. DUNKASE.—Did not the member for Waterloo say that nobody would believe it in Upper Canada?

Mr. FOLEY.—Certainly not. I said nothing in reference to this article.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he had been a public man for th rty-six years, and he had never yet found it necessary to complain to the House of a libel, although he had read all manner of things written against him. But he had never dreamed of asking the House to help him out of such difficulties, any more than he would dream of jumping over the house. There had been such interferences by the old Lower Canadian Parliament, when one editor was sent for three months to gaol, and another had his presses and types destroyed; but would any one now justify that procedure? He was sorry that none who had been members of the old Lower Canadian Parliament, because this discussion could not be continued much longer, and it was desirable that such explanations should be given in order that the House might be enabled to come to a proper conclusion on the Address.—(Hear, hear.)

Atty Gen. MACDONALD said he had promised to make an explanation to the House, either during the debate, or at its conclusion. He thought it better that the explanation should be made at the conclusion of the debate, because the House had entered upon the discussion of a subject which should stand upon its own merits.

Mr. BROWN.—I first put the question at exactly a similar period when Sir Allan MacNab sought for ministerial explanations.

Atty Gen. MACDONALD continued—The amendments proposed to the Address ought also to stand upon their merits. The House had entered largely, during a three or four day's discussion, into the Speech and the amendments, and he did not see that the merits of this Speech or the amendments thereto could now be affected by personal explanations. Hon. gentlemen would remember that the House then got the Address the first time after a general election, and that the Administration of which he was a leading member was constituted before an appeal was made to the people. The Government had been before the people, full explanations had been made by himself to his constituents, and he had no doubt that the other hon. gentlemen forming the Administration had given similar explanations to their several constituencies. He therefore thought that they ought not now to inter upt the discussion on the Address by entering into explanations which could not affect the Speech or the amendments standing on the paper, and on the first of which amendment they had already with so much interest the speech of the hon. and learned member for Montreal. He should feel himself called upon at the proper time to make such explanations as the Government might deem proper. The Government would not be porte-en crimnie in the delay which had taken place in answering the Speech from the Throne. If it had been answered, as it ought to have been, on Monday last, it would have been much better, for then not only explanations could have been given, but the business of the country proceeded without further delay. He threw the responsibility of the delay upon the gentlemen opposite. He would first ask the House to give their votes upon the Address and upon the amendments, and then his colleagues and himself would be prepared to give their reasons for taking office, and to explain everything necessary in connection with the recent Administration.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD regretted the unwillingness on the part of the gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches to enlarge upon the policy they intended to pursue in relation to the affairs of the Province. He confessed that he had been waiting with eagerness for an explanation as to the nature of that policy. Except what fell from the Inspector General the other night, which amounted to very little, nothing had been elicited as to the future course of the Ministry. He was of opinion that the hon. gentlemen forming the Administration ought to have come out manfully and boldly, and informed the House at the outset, upon what policy they went to the country. (Hear, hear.) If they look back to the history of Administrations in this country, they would find that no Government had gone to the country without some great issue, and some valid reason for disturbing the country with a general election, at a time when the Parliament would shortly have expired of its own accord. He recollected the great issue before the country which divided parties into two great sections, and until recently there had been a distinct party claiming to be conservatives, and an equally distinct party claiming to be reformers. The great issues at stake for many years were those affecting the Clergy Reserves, the Legislative Council, and the Seignorial Tenure. These questions had been before the people ever since he was a child, and upon them parties took their stand and battled year after year. These great questions were, however, at last settled.—He would take the House back to the time when Mr. Baldwin and Mr. Lafontaine accepted office. Those gentlemen formed a government than which there had not been a stronger in this country. That Ministry initiated a policy the beneficial results of which were felt almost every day. During the time of that strong, able and energetic Administration, he would ask what principles sustained them? He need only refer hon. members to the history of that Administration to show that at the very commencement of their ministry they introduced a measure to give to the people of the country a sufficient school fund which would enable every parent to give his children a good education; they gave on an election law by which every individual residing in a township was entitled to vote in that township, by which disturbances were, in a great measure, prevented throughout the country; they gave us a law to prevent the packing of juries by sheriffs; they made a valuable amendation to the assessment law, and a Division Court Act, which was a great boon, inasmuch as it brought cheap justice to every man's door. He could also enumerate party measure which they carried through. They, however, failed, by reason of the vigorous and able opposition, to carry one those great measures which the country demanded —namely, the Clergy Reserves, the Legislative Council, and the Seignorial Tenure Bill. When Mr. Hincks was called upon to take the reins of Government after Mr. Lafontaine had retired, he came out with a policy based on the principles of those great measures which had been carried, which he (Mr. Macdonald) considered the consummation of the efforts of the country. He regretted the resignations consequent upon the retirement of Mr. Hincks and Mr. Lafontaine, but he did not consider that the Administration was bound to follow the example of those gentlemen in resigning office, because they differed from the majority of the Cabinet. Those gentlemen formed a Government which was supported by the majority of the House, they were in exactly the same predicament with regard to their supporters from Upper Canada. (Hear, hear.) He wanted to know what the country had to expect from the present Ministers, and he must say that their energy to conduct the affairs of the country, and who, instead of standing or falling by the measures which they brought down, were obliged to content themselves with carrying, by a sectional vote, schemes which ought to be adopted upon there own merits? He had given a brief history of past governments, up to the time when the Treasury benches were occupied by the Administration now in power. They have recently gone to the country, and to secure the just verdict of the country, they ought to have advocated a settled policy, without any reference to place or power. He regretted that the Attorney General had not given any explanations why they had put the country to the trouble of a general election, when, at the same time, the Government had no settled policy upon the great questions on which they went to the people. The country was taken by surprise. The elections were hurried through, and that was the ground on which Upper Canada occupies at this moment, notwithstanding the powerful influence which patronage ever gives in a new country like Canada. (Hear, hear.) Upper Canada rejected the Ministerial programme, despised the Ministerial support, and returned to the House a most decided majority in opposition to the Ministry. Under other administrations the double majority was not mentioned, because they had a majority in both sections, and found that they could legislate for one without doing injustice to the other. It is important that there should be confidence reposed in the Ministry by both Provinces, and he asked the Attorney General must have felt; for otherwise he would have selected his colleagues from his own friends in the House and would not have tried to recruit from the reform ranks. The present was a dangerous precedent. He was sure the Attorney General would see the necessity of not proceeding too far with it, for if he did the people of Upper Canada would not put up with it. He might indeed retain his seat by grappling with great questions.

Hon. J. A. MACDONALD—What are they?

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD—Those on which the country expects the Government to legislate, but which they confess themselves unfit to legislate upon, since they abandon them for much smaller matter, upon which they hope to escape dissent. The Opposition had been sent back from the elections forming a large party. He said a large party, because in 1856 the majority against Ministers was only two or three, whereas at present it was six. Not an accidental majority, but one likely to be permanent. Now, if the affairs of the country were still to be administered in this way, Representation according to Population must come as a thing of course. Let the administration remain in power one day after the representatives of Upper Canada should have declared their want of confidence, and the Speaker and others who entertained views such as he did, might find cause for a change. How did the Crown Lands Commissioner feel when an Upper Canadian majority ruled Lower Canada? Did he not feel indignant as I do now?

Mr. SICOTTE—We are not forcing anything on Upper Canada.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD—Well, Mr. Hincks had declared that he would not go on with an Upper Canada minority, even when that minority occurred on the Speakership, though his colleague Mr. Morin in Lower Canada had a majority. After that we heard no more of a difference between the two majorities, until the occurrence which led to the retirement of Sir Allan MacNab. The explanations of that retirement the House was informed that Sir Allan had objected to the theory of a double majority. If so, by whom was that theory invoked? It must have been by the other members of the Cabinet. Sir Allan was succeeded by Mr. Taché, who got a majority by which they sustained themselves during the last session of Parliament; but at the opening of the present Parliament, there was a distinct intimation that the Government had not the confidence of the Upper Canada majority. Upon that intimation the Premier should have resigned. Did he expect to shake that majority? Did he suppose, as it had been said that night, that he could buy up this majority at the rate of £300 per head? If not, then he sustained his view of the duty of Ministers by the opinions of Mr. Morin and others, that affairs could not be conveniently carried on without a majority from both sections of the Province.

After the recess

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD resumed his remarks. He said—A leading feature of the present Administration, since its first formation, was the retirement or transfer of which its prominent members have been guilty towards their colleagues. That charge was made by the hon. Premier (Sir Allan MacNab), when he endeavored to leave the Administration, because of the withdrawal of some of his colleagues from office, by which he was deprived of the support of a majority from Upper Canada. That charge was made by other members of the Administration who were obliged to leave it. That feature also characterized the Administration, since the formation of the present Government, and he (Mr. Macdonald) proceeded to show that the Attorney General West had for years opposed the Clergy Reserve Bill and the Legislative Council Bill as republican measures; but on taking office they ignominiously changed their position, and formed the course of legislation which they had for so many years most strenuously opposed. And what was the consequence? These measures were carried by large majorities; and he wished to show thereby that it was impossible for great measures to be adopted, unless there were majorities in both sections of the province to carry them out.—(Hear, hear.) No attempt had, however, been made to carry out other great questions which had been ably discussed on the floor of the House. The country received at the hands of Sir Allan MacNab's Government the measures to which he had referred; but the School Bill, the Clergy Reserve Bill, and the Seignorial Tenure Bill required amendment, and a Coalition Government was formed for the purpose of carrying those great questions out. What had been the result of that coalition? What had been its policy? And in how far had the public expectations been realised? After these questions were settled, how had the party maintained themselves in the House? They found, among the other obligations which Sir Allan MacNab and his party had undertaken to fulfil, on consideration of getting into power that a legacy of the Grand Trunk Railway was left on their hands. And the history of the Grand Trunk Railway exhibited one of the most shameful courses of procedure that had ever disgraced Parliament. From the time the hon. gentleman came to take the Legislation upon it, the undertaking had been carried on by giving Government aid to other sections of the province, in order to gain votes for that enterprise. There had been no measure connected with the Grand Trunk which could be carried out without involving the province in heavy engagements, to purchase support to effect it. To this end, £50,000 were voted by the Government of Mr. Hincks to make the Chats Canal. Where now was that £50,000? It was lost, and furnished a monument of the depravity of Parliament at the time it was voted. And this was only one of many instances of money not being expended in other sections of the Province in order to obtain the necessary funds for building the Grand Trunk. Hon. gentlemen would see the difficulties the province had been placed in by reason of their not being an Administration sufficiently strong to withstand the appeals which were made upon it. Ever since day by day its supporters, who only upheld it on condition of its plunging the Province into debt for undertakings from which it was impossible the country could ever expect to receive returns hereafter. The time has now come for an appeal to hon members to say whether they were not again in the same unfortunate position. A general election had taken place, and notwithstanding the Government had a large majority of the whole House, they were in exactly the same predicament with regard to their supporters from Upper Canada. (Hear, hear.) He wanted to know what the country had to expect from the present Ministers, and he must say that their energy to conduct the affairs of the country, and who, instead of standing or falling by the measures which they brought down, were obliged to content themselves with carrying, by a sectional vote, schemes which ought to be adopted upon there own merits? The Opposition had been sent back from the elections forming a large party. He said a large party, because in 1856 the majority against Ministers was only two or three, whereas at present it was six. Not an accidental majority, but one likely to be permanent. Now, if the affairs of the country were still to be administered in this way, Representation according to Population must come as a thing of course. Let the administration remain in power one day after the representatives of Upper trade as free as American vessels enjoyed in Canadian waters. Talking of this matter of reciprocity, too, he complained that there was no account of the export from Canada to the United States. Taking the American returns, it seemed that they had exported $20,000,000, while Canada had only sent $17,000,000 to them—what had Canada then gained? And had the Government sought to provide against the difficulties which must ensue from such a state of things?

Hon. J. A Macdonald—Do you mean by borrowing more money?

Hon. J. S. Macdonald—No, but by fostering manufactures, and encouraging immigration, instead of giving money for a railway below Quebec, where it was almost useless. The country was paying immense sums yearly for interest on the Grand Trunk, for the municipal debentures, and for the Northern road, and it seemed that no attempt was to be made to relieve that road from all its difficulties at the expense of the Province. Again, though the House had modified the way of collecting the money under the Municipal Loan Fund, the Government had furnished no account of the money and yet Parliament was called on to say they were convinced that economy had been practised. But indeed no one could tell in what manner the Board of Works Department was conducted.—Now, was this to be wondered at, when a gentleman came to the head of the Department and left it again after staying only some six months, till the organ rods him out again. No one could learn anything at or about the Department.—He had had friends who called there to see the Assistant Commissioner and who at length gave up in despair the attempt to find him. It appeared from the statement of the Auditor of Accounts that there were several items of expenses amounting to £238,000, for which he had no vouchers. And then there followed these remarks. "Tug-boats below Quebec—bonus to "Mr. Baby £1,285." No explanation to show Mr. Baby became entitled to this sum!! "Emi- "gration, there are two receipts, showing that "£1,500 were paid: no particulars. Light houses "below Quebec: no contract; no details or "other explanation how the charge rendered "£7,500 was arrived at; and tug-boats below "Quebec—receipts for £17,300. No particulars. "Trinity House £1,000 paid for services $——" there is nothing in this or in the four preced- "ing items susceptible of being audited." There were most extraordinary things done in the lower part of the Province. One had heard of £500 being given to secure the election of Mr. Cauchon and £500 to secure that of his opponent. Then it appeared that the banks had made advances of more than £100,000 on certificates of which no account had been rendered.

Hon. J. A Macdonald—What has the Government to do with that. The contractor lodges his certificates with the bank, and the bank takes the risk, that is all.

Hon. J. S. Macdonald also complained of the unfair preference which he said had been given to favorite contractors. Colonel Vankoughnet too, had made a profit of $10,000 on a purchase of a mill site on the St. Lawrence Canal. Another favourite of the Government hearing of that, had another mill site, and upon which he had a lease, had it extended from ten to twenty-one years. Yet, with the known defects of this department, there was no attempt at amending it. He again condemned the expenditure authorized on the Athabasca branch of the Grand Trunk, the Stratford and Sarnia Road, and the Railroad below Quebec. The Grand Trunk Road had done other mischief besides that to the revenue. It had entirely ruined every farmer, and those gentlemen, he thought, were entitled to some consideration and assistance. On the Hudson's Bay question, he would say nothing against the distinguished gentleman who had been sent to England till he had all the papers before him. What he thought should be done with that territory, was to settle it as it was required, and not to get into trouble with our neighbours about it. There would soon be a railway to it from Minnesota, and it would in the winter be very difficult to approach it from Canada. He believed that there were lands within the limits of Canada that might well be cultivated and improved, without making railways to Lake Winnipeg or to the moon. These would be like the £50,000 given to Mr Egan for the survey of the Ottawa Canal, which had produced nothing at all. With regard to the Seat of Government, he was not in the country when the resolution had been adopted to send it to England, and he therefore felt himself free to act upon it. In the mean time, he was not satisfied with the manner in which it had been mentioned in the Speech; but thought that the Governor General ought to have announced the decision, which was at least an object of attention as the question of Insolvency, or the revenue to be derived from the Fisheries. It had been debated very frequently, and had formed the subject of a league between the member for Toronto and the member for Montmorenci, for the continuance of the alternate system. But after all this, what had taken place as to her Majesty's decision? At the very moment when the Inspector General was extending his peregrinations from Lake Huron to Ontario, the despatch of her Majesty was published, and yet that very despatch was still kept back from the House. He supposed it was now to be again an open question, and would not be surprised if a bill should be brought in to stay the expenditure of the £250,000 voted for the buildings. He could not give his support to this government. There were men in it in whom he had confidence; but there had been so many patchings up that he had now come to the conclusion that parties ought to form themselves anew in such a way as to walk over the House altogether.

Mr. Ferrie—Don't you want to patch up again with your double majority?

Hon. J. S. Macdonald—Oh! if the hon. gentleman's views were really known, they are probably very different from those of his Lower Canadian allies, whom he is so ready to praise for their liberality. It is a pity they cannot return the compliment; but he is against the double majority because, I suppose, he thinks the time is nearly come when French Canadians may be crushed. For his part he was not afraid of the necessity of any patching up, nor of the dead lock which a high authority had recorded his opinion would be the result of adopting the double majority principle. He believed that the sober thought of the people of both sections would always enable them to come to terms on the Government. He had heard of dead locks before—dead locks from making the Legislative Council elective; and annexation to the United States, from giving the municipalities the power to choose their own officers; but no mischief followed the prophecies of evil, nor did he fear any now. In conclusion he said he desired to see a government that would concern itself for the actual interest of the country; but such a government also, as when they wanted their colleagues to retire, would not do so by putting their organs to attack them.

EXTRACT FROM MR. BROWN'S SPEECH ON THE ADDRESS.

Mr. Brown—Have we not received benefit from other railways, and have we paid money to them in the same way?—Do you think of presenting any money to the Great Western? Do you think of relieving the Northern Railroad, or the Woodstock and Lake Erie, or the Port Hope, or the Cobourg, or the Prescott?—Not one of them. But there was a reason why—because members of the Administration—because hon. gentlemen opposite were sitting in the Grand Trunk Board of Directors as the paid servants of the contractors—and unfortunately this has not ceased even yet. We were told the other night that the Solicitor General East, who was a Director of that Road, had resigned his connection with it. I am glad he did so. But another member is still President of the Grand Trunk, a salaried officer of the Company, and at the same time a member of the Executive Council of the Province. ("hear, hear.") But, Sir, one word more as to that strange paragraph in the Address which requires us to say "we are convinced "that due economy had been used in the "expenditure of the funds entrusted to the "Executive Government." If there ever was a Government in a position totally to debar them from asking an approval of their financial proceedings, if there is one gentleman in this House who more than all others, from his well known opinions, ought to be opposed to that Government, and specially opposed to it on financial grounds it is the member for Sherbrooke. He, Sir, will say they that the statement made by my hon. friend from Cornwall was strictly correct. It was shown by my hon. friend that the books of several Departments were in the habit of drawing cash from the bank account without the knowledge or control of the finance minister, and that the public accounts did not show an expense amount which was the very theft of the Queen's Bench. It was disclosed by the Committee of the House and Public Accounts that the "books of the Inspector General and Receiver General did not agree; that sums paid were often placed to one account in the books of the one, and to another account in the books of the other. It was shown by the hon. member for Haldimand, that the cash accounts of the Crown Lands Department were not balanced for five months; and it was likewise shown that the Postmaster General had drawn £30,000 from the public chest, entirely unknown to the Receiver General. Nay, Sir, the Deputy Receiver General admitted that at no one moment could the Receiver General state what was the correct amount in the public exchequer. Then a great many gross irregularities have occured in regard to debentures; and one circumstance alone has occured since Parliament last met, that should of itself deprive the hon. gentlemen opposite of all claims to such an expression of confidence as that now demanded. I mention the facts as they have reached me, and the Hon. Inspector General will correct me if what I state is inaccurate. Hon. gentlemen will recollect the history of the Consolidated Loan Fund—that was abused by the Government of the day—that large sums were lent to Corporations unable to meet their debts—and that the whole thing was finally abolished last session so far as regards Upper Canada. Not one sixpence further of Consolidated Loan Fund debentures were to be issued. But a few days before the election took place in Peterboro' the late member for that county, Mr. Conger, came to the Government and demanded as the only means of securing his election that he should have aid from the public chest for the Port Hope and Peterboro' Railroad. Mr. Conger, Sir, went back with $100,000 worth of debentures from the Consolidated Loan Fund—and he claimed re-election from his constituents on the ground that he had squeezed the money out of the government. ("hear, hear.") I am told that the Hon. Inspector General offers in extenuation of this transaction that these debentures were ordered to be issued for another Municipal Corporation, before the passing of the Act to abolish the Loan Fund—that that Corporation declined taking them, and that all the Inspector General did was to put Peterboro in the place of that other Municipality. Now, Sir, I contend that this is no palliation—that the hon. gentleman had no right to issue a single debenture after the passage of the repeal Act. If there were corporations that had not taken up the debentures awarded them, so much the better. The public debt was so much the lighter. No new transaction was legal or ought to have been made, (hear, hear.) And the financial view is not the worst aspect of this most improper transaction. The attempt to corrupt the people to carry an election by direct use of the provincial funds—on the very eve of an electoral contest to bribe the electors with their own money, was the most shameless part of the transaction, (hear, hear.) Fortunately, Sir, the men of Peterboro were not to be bought—but no thanks to the administration for that—the attempt was as criminal as if it had succeeded.

Hon. Mr. Cayley—The hon. gentleman is indulging the House with a tissue of error though I dare say he is not doing it intentionally.

Mr. Brown—The hon. Inspector General is as oracular as usual! "It is a tissue "of error, though I dare say it was not "intentional!" Wherein lies the error? Let him correct it on the spot. It is now late, and the hon. gentleman may have no opportunity of explanation before the House adjourns. I will sit down that he may make his explanation. (Mr. Cayley showed no signs of correcting the "error," and Mr. Brown proceeded.) Ah, the hon. gentleman will not explain the "error," which must remain locked up in the breast of the hon. Inspector General,—he will not condescend to take compassion upon us and enlighten our darkness. (Laughter.) But let us look at another transaction—the affair of the Montreal debentures. The facts of this case are well known. The Montreal Turnpike Trust borrowed Provincial debentures from the Government to the amount of £47,000. Of these debentures £13,000 were bought up by the Government, cancelled and burnt. An order in Council afterwards issued for the payment of the whole £47,000—£34,000 was applied in redeeming the balance of the debentures—but £13,000 lay untouched in the bank for 14 months, and might have been there still, but that it was accidentally discovered by a clerk that the debentures had been already redeemed and burnt up! For 14 long months it was undiscovered that the money had been paid! The public accounts had been balanced once, if not twice during the time—but no discovery was made. What a state must the public finances be in when £13,000 could be withdrawn from the exchequer 13 or 14 months without the Receiver General knowing anything about it, and the debentures burnt without a record of the fact!

Attorney General Cartier—Does the hon. gentleman say that there was no record kept of the burning of the debentures?

Mr. Brown.—The hon. gentleman has not said that there was no record of the debentures being burnt, but he says that the record was not such as to prevent the case being a second time devoted to the same service. If money can be thus taken from the public chest to redeem the same debentures twice, what confidence can the country or this House have in the management of public affairs. But let us pass to another transaction. Every member of this House knows that certain large public works were executed in Upper Canada, at at early part of the Union, and a large sum of money expended upon them. It was considered expedient in 1849 or 1850 to sell these works. They were accordingly put up by auction, and disposed of to several parties. Among others, Mr. James Beaty, of Toronto, became a purchaser of the New roads, for £75,000; the Dundas road was sold to Mr. Miller, for a large sum. The terms of sale were that the money should be paid by instalments, that five per cent on the principal should be paid every year, and five per cent interest. Both gentlemen were strong supporters of the Government, and it soon appeared from the public accounts that they were allowed to go largely into arrears for both interest and instalments. Early in last Session I moved an Address to her Excellency, praying for a return of the monies paid, and the amounts still in arrear; I tried day after day and week after week to obtain these particulars; I was told the House was with the Secretary's office, then with the Inspector General's office, and lastly with the Board of Works; but at length, at the very close of the Session, when the return was of no service to Parliament, we got the papers, and by them we found that Mr. Jas. Beaty, being a supporter of the Government, had been allowed to commute the enormous amount of nearly £20,000 and Mr. Miller of Dundas to a great amount. Now, Sir, we found further, that by a singular mode of calculating the interest, the Inspector General had presented to Mr. Beaty a gratuity of a magnificent nature of nearly £7,000. Public Sir, I say, is found to [illegible]

By the arrival of the bark Venus we have advices from Curacoa to February 11. There were some rumours in Venezuela of a revolution in favour of General Boez.

By an arrival from St. Domingo, on the 13th ult., information had been received that General Boez still held his own against Santa Anna, and that he was supplied with provisions, &c., in abundance from Curacoa. He had purchased a number of Curacoa schooners and converted them into men-of-war.

Mr. Everett replied briefly and eloquently, expressing his heartfelt thanks for his high distinction conferred on him.

To-night an anti-Lecompton meeting is being held at the Concert Hall, which is crowded to its utmost capacity. Hon. News by the "Kangaroo" and "Canada."

A Ministerial crisis has occurred in England. On Monday, 22nd inst., Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons, and Earl Granville, in the House of Lords, announced that in consequence of the decision of the House of Commons in regard to the refugee question and the conspiracy bill, Ministers on the 20th tendered their resignation to the Queen, and the same was accepted. Lord Derby has formed a Cabinet. A list of the names is given elsewhere.

The trial of the conspirators against the life of the Emperor Napoleon resulted in the conviction of Orsini, Rudio and Pierri, who have been sentenced to death, and of Gomez who had been condemned to penal servitude for life.

A despatch from Lord Cowley, the British Minister in Paris, to Lord Clarendon, was communicated in both Houses. The despatch was written in consequence of the resolutions adopted by the Commons, imputing blame to the Palmerston Cabinet in not replying to the note from the French Government. Lord Cowley states that although no formal reply was sent to Count Walewski, he fully explained to the French authorities the sentiments of the British Government, and their views and intentions, in a manner likely to prove far more satisfactory than an official answer could have been. What these views were Lord Cowley thus explains in his note:

"I have now your Lordship's letter before me, in which, while vindicating in language worthy your lordship's name, the right of asylum which Great Britain has ever afforded to strangers of all ranks and nations, and while declaring in terms as explicit as they are determined, the impossibility of infringing on that great principle of our constitution, you show how utterly insufficient must any enactment be to prevent men of desperate minds from entering upon desperate undertakings. As your lordship's true but very inadequate organ, I have faithfully represented your feelings and your principles; and could I call upon the Emperor or Count Walewski as witnesses, neither, I feel certain, could belie my words. I know not what may be the result of last night's vote: but at all events, I lose no time in stating my convictions that to your lordships judicious and prudent conduct, at a very critical moment, it is owing that, without the shadow of the sacrifice of a single principle, our relations with the government have not received a shock which might have been fatal to the friendship which happily prevails between the two nations."

The French refugee Bernard had again been examined before a chief magistrate and remanded for further evidence. The counsel for the prisoner in a vehement speech demanded the admission of bail, and called on the migistrate to treat the defendant as if he were an Englishman, and not to be influenced by fear of a Foreign Power. The speech was received with great cheering and uproar in court.

A prosecution has been commenced by the English Government against a London book-seller, named Truelove, for publishing a libelous pamphlet concerning the Emperor of the French, with a view to incite divers persons to assassinate his said Majesty.

The "demonstration" which was to have taken place in Hyde Park on Saturday, the 21st, upon the refugee question, was abandoned "in consequence of the patriotic decision of the House of Commons;" but, nevertheless, a sufficient number of questionable characters assembled in the park to give employment to the police, who had been strongly posted in the vicinity to preserve order.

Mazzini writes to the London Times, denying that Orsini was guilty of any crime in Italy, and concludes with the following paragraph:

"Whatever opinion of Orsini may be entertained by those who frankly appeal to Heaven and earth against the attempted murder of a tyrant, and do quietly witness, without a single word of indignation, the lasting murder of a whole people in Rome, no one has a right of taxing Orsini with dishonesty, theft and collusion. The agents of Louis Napoleon ought to be contented with beheading his enemies without calumniating them."

Mr. Loftus C. Ottway is appointed British Minister to Mexico, and A. R. J. S. Lumley Secretary of Legation at Madrid.

The trial of the Irish Priest, Father Conway, for resorting to religious intimidation at an election, resulted in the disagreement and discharge of the jury.

The trial of the Directors of the Royal British Bank was still progressing without eliciting anything of importance not already known to the public.

A Committee of the House of Commons had been appointed to inquire into an alleged charge of corruption against Mr. Isaac Butt, an Irish member of Parliament. The charge is that he had accepted the office of agent in Parliament of the Ameer Ali Moorad, and was receiving pay for the same.

The London Post says that three vacant quarters in the gift of Lord Palmerston have been conferred on the Duke of Wellington and Norfolk and Earl Harrowby. Mr. Hayter, late whipper in of the Ministry, is to be [illegible] Steward; also Mr. Grimble, a distinguished [illegible] engineer [illegible]

An action was brought in the British Admiralty Court by the owners of the American ship Leander against the steamer North American, to recover damages for the loss of the Leander by the recent collision off Holyhead. A verdict was given against the steamer, whose owners gave notice of an appeal to a higher court.

The Indian loan bill was moved forward a stage, in view of the fact that the company was urgently pressed for funds. The amount of the loan was reduced from ten to eight millions sterling.

The suspension was announced of Messrs. Samuel Lee & Co., cotton dealers, Manchester. Liabilities stated at £112,000, and assets £126,000.

The returns of the Board of Trade for the month of January shows a continued falling off in the exports. The reduction was £1,836,505 from the figure of January 1857. The imports were about stationary.

The government had given no ice that the rate for the renewal of Exchequer bills about to fall due would be 2d per day (equal to £3 0s. 10d per annum) instead of 2½d per day as of late.

The screw line of steamers, comprising the City of Baltimore, City of Washington, City of Manchester and Kangaroo, are announced to hereafter leave Liverpool on the alternate Wednesday, hitherto reserved to the Collins line.

The American ship William Singer, bound from Callao to London with guano, went ashore at Brook, Isle of White, but was towed off and taken to Cowes, leaking badly.

The China mail of yesterday has brought correct statistics of the tea trade for the past year. The total exports were 35,500,000 pounds, against 42,400,000 pounds last year, and 54,800,000 pounds at the same period of 1856.

Advices from Calcutta are in all respects satisfactory. Government securities had risen four to five per cent, and although the five per cent were still quoted as low as ten per cent discount, confidence amongst native holders was evidently reviving.

Ministerial Crisis in England.

Resignation and Reconstruction of the British Ministry.

In the House of Lords on the 22d ult.,

Earl Granville announced the resignation of the Ministry. The decision of the House of Commons on Friday last left the ministry no alternative but to tender their resignation to her Majesty; it had been accepted, and he understood that the Earl of Derby (who was not present) had undertaken to form a government. He believed the Earl of Derby wished, as a matter of convenience, that the House at its rising should adjourn till Friday next.

The Earl of Malmesbury stated that the Earl of Derby was then engaged in the task entrusted to him by her Majesty, and that it was certainly his wish that there should be an adjournment till Friday.

Lord Campbell repeated his opinion as to the liability of aliens to the penalties of the law of England for crimes committed within the realm, which by a statement attributed to the Attorney General in the House of Commons has been misrepresented. By that statement it appeared as if Lord Campbell had declared that a foreigner might do with impunity what would be crime in a native. This, he declared, was not the law of the land, and it was important it should be known that such was not the law. Within the realm the law made no distinction between the natural born subject and the alien. While within the realm the alien was within allegiance to the Crown, and for any crime could be tried by the same procedure as a subject. An alien conspiring to do anything malum in se, in this country, could be tried for the crime. He approved the bill of the government and should support it.

The Lord Chancellor thought it very probable that the Attorney General had been misrepresented.

The Havelock Annuity bill was read a third time and passed.

Their Lordships then adjourned till Friday next.

In the House of Commons, on the 22d ult.,

Lord Palmerston rose to make a statement with respect to the course which her Majesty's government had thought it their duty to pursue in consequence of the vote of Friday. That vote, he said, had led them to the conclusion that the only course they could pursue, with a due regard to their own honor and the respect due to the House, was to tender their resignation to her Majesty, who had been pleased to accept them, and they held offices only until their successors were appointed. He moved that the House at its rising do adjourn until Friday next.

This motion was agreed to.

Parliament met on the 27th. In the House of Commons new writs were ordered for the seats occupied by members of the cabinet. Both houses had adjourned until March 1st.

The New Ministry.

The Earl of Derby had constructed a new Cabinet, of which the members are as follows:—

Premier—Lord Derby.
Chancellor of the Exchequer—Benjamin Disraeli.
President of the Council—Earl of Salisbury.
Lord Privy Seal—Earl of Hardwicke.
Home Department—Spencer Walpole.
Foreign Department—Earl of Malmesbury.
Colonial Secretary—Lord Stanley of Alderly.
Minister of War—General Peel.
First Lord of the Admiralty—Sir John Pakington.
Postmaster General—Lord Colchester.
President of the Board of Trade—Mr. Henley.
President of the Board of Control—Lord Ellenborough.
President of the Board of Public Works—Lord John Manners.
Attorney General—Sir Fitzroy Kelly.
Viceroy of Ireland—The Earl of Eglintown.
Irish Chancellor—Justice Blackburne.
Chief Secretary—Lord Naas.

The members of the Government not in the Cabinet include the Duke of Montrose as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Mr. Cairnes as Solicitor General, Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald as Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the Earl of Carnarvon as Under Secretary of the Colonies, Lord Hardinge as Under Secretary of War.

The Advertiser says Lord St. Leonard is to have a seat in the Cabinet without office.

The high office of Governor General of India is said to be reserved for Lord Stanley, in the event of Lord Canning declining to serve.

The great offices of her Majesty's household will be given to the Marquis of Bath, the Earls Delaware and Chesterfield.

Ministerial Address.

Mr. Disraeli had issued his address to the electors of Bucks, offering himself for the fifth time for re-election. The following passage occurs in the address:—

"The circumstances of the country are in many respects critical, and in none more so than in its external relations. Painful misconceptions have arisen with the government of that faithful and powerful ally, who in so many instances has proved his good feeling and fidelity to this country. Believing that a cordial alliance between England and France is equally conducive to the interests of both countries, I shall express my hope and conviction that by measures at once firm and conciliatory, these causes of misunderstanding may be speedily and entirely removed. If the country will heartily support the Queen's government at this conjuncture, the result so desirable for the peace and progress of Europe will be greatly facilitated."

Sir J. Pakington, in an address to the electors of Droitwich, after announcing that he has joined Lord Derby's Cabinet, says:—"It is essential to the well working of our system of Parliamentary Government, that the people should not suppose there is only one man who could be entrusted with the public interests."

The Times says of Mr. Disraeli's electoral address, that it eludes giving a just account of the actual crisis. The allusion to the painful misconception with the government of France, which Mr. Disraeli asks the electors to help to remove, is examined by the Times, which says that nobody has yet charged the late Government with misconception. They were charged with conniving rather than misconceiving. The only misconception in the affair was that which ascribed to Count Walewski an intention to insult and traduce England, and it was made by those who turned out the late government, and for the purpose of turning it out.

The Herald believes that Mr. Blackburne has accepted the post of Lord Chancellor of Ireland, in which case Mr. Napier will be the Judge of the Court of Appeal, Mr. Whiteside Attorney General, and Mr. Fitzgerald Solicitor General.

The Herald also understands that Lord Dalkeith was offered the Scotch Lordship of the Treasury, and that he declined it in cordial terms of confidence and support.

The Herald says the Colonial Secretaryship was offered to Sir Bulwer Lytton, but declined, because the hon. gentleman was unwilling to expose the county of Hertford to the excitement of a severe contest.

County By-Law.

The parties who are endeavoring to persuade the rate-payers of the County of Peterborough that now is the time to borrow £50,000, to be expended in making certain leading roads, are quite astray, when they suppose that taxation, consequent upon the raising the money, and the scarcity of money itself, are the only objections that raise themselves before the imagination of the parties who are to have an opportunity of pronouncing upon the fate of the By-Law. There are, indeed, few who are not alive to the advantages to be derived from the gravelling of the roads, and there are also many who would not object to paying toll every time they entered the market town unless, perhaps, such as live contiguous to the town. Then as to the necessity for going into the scheme, has it arisen from the complaints of the farming interests? Not at all; instead of that, it is the anxious commissioner, under whom the money is to be expended; the cunning money changer who will convert the debentures into currency; the knowing contractor, and last, though not least, the smiling treasurer, who have made the discovery that the County of Peterborough, like the town of Peterborough, will never be worth anything until it gets inextricably involved in difficulties. Says the organ of the wide-awake speculators, "we presume that the opponents of the scheme will not pretend to say that the expenditure of this sum among the people of this County would very considerably relieve them from the pressure of the hard times." Of course we do not pretend to contradict this astute proposition. The gentlemen who are advocating the scheme, have just sucked the town finances dry, and now turn upon the County, to keep the pot boiling. The gentleman who opposed the making of the Port Hope Branch Railway, while there was no money on the board, and became converted as soon as he had an idea that he could get £1500 sterling! by his change of tune, is not at all likely to have it in contemplation to meet with similar good fortune in negociating County debentures as befel him when he took charge of the financial interests of the town! But if the movers in the business want to know what it is that is going to strangle their efforts to involve the county, we will frankly tell them that it is because such men are found at the head of it as Commissioner Conger, Treasurer Sheridan, and General Broker Clinton. The names of these pretended friends of the people are never mentioned, without producing a suspicion that it is their own ends they are aiming to accomplish, and not the advancement of the general interest of the community. When we spoke about the By-law before, it was with the impression that it provided for the bridging of Mud Lake and Pigeon Lake; but, upon examination, it appears that these bridges are only an outside talk, to smooth the way for a vote in Ennismore. No mention is made of either of these bridges in the By-law, and the improvements to be carried out under it are "certain leading roads," consequently none of the funds raised under it can be laid out in any other way than in making roads. For the construction of necessary bridges to connect Ennismore with Smith on the one side, and Harvey on the other, another By-law must be got passed to raise the necessary funds. Mr. Conger may chuckle over the wording of the present By-law, so as to get him the Ennismore vote, and enable him afterwards to get rid of making the bridges, but there is no fairness in it, and its exposure gives an insight into the character of the scheme generally. Through the treachery of certain reeves, a thinly peopled township is allowed to put its vote against the most populous, so that unless some exertion is made to bring out the matter in proper aspect, a vote may be got favorable to it. The town of Peterboro has an opportunity to-day, of observing how the debentures business connected with the railroad has been conducted, and if they are satisfied with it, they had better vote for the County By-law, and secure the continuance of such management as is therein exhibited But if they are alive to a sense of the danger that surrounds them, they will meet manfully the insidious attempt that is made by designing men upon their pockets, and content themselves with the experience they have gained of the trickery of public servants, without continuing the system of unlimited confidence to a point that will leave themselves bankrupt, and the sharpers in a condition to laugh at them. In order to get a thorough acquaintance with the intentions of the schemers, it would be satisfactory that public meetings be called, and explanations demanded.

The Grand Sacred Concert, advertised to take place on Wednesday, (to-morrow) in St. Peter's Church, promises to be a very attractive performance. Mr. Labelle, who is a celebrated musician, will preside at the Organ, and together with a Choir of vocalists of established fame, will form a musical complement unequalled by anything of the kind that has ever been brought out in Peterborough. The particular character of the occasion will be a strong invitation to many who will be present; and it is hoped that a re-union of the divided feeling which gives to St. Peter's Church a separate congregation, will prevail for the time, and encourage many others who are not of that church, to indulge their taste for superior music. The Organ is represented to be a very excellent instrument, and, under the management of Mr. Labelle, will undoubtedly have its high reputation confirmed.

Melancholy Accident.

Mr. John Evans, a gentleman who had seen much service in India, during the late war, he being then attached to the 9th Lancers, met with his death in a melancholy manner, in North Douro, on Saturday last, March 13th. The deceased was riding in a sleigh in company with some other gentlemen, having with them some loaded guns, one of which went off by accident, and its contents of small shot entered his body, causing his death in less than twenty-four hours. Mr. Evans had received clasps and medals during his service in the army, and possessed the respect of his acquaintances.

☞ Will somebody be so kind as to explain why in the Debenture account with the Treasurer of the Town of Peterboro' only thirty-nine debentures are taken account of, while in the Municipal Loan Fund Debenture account the Town is charged with forty-two debentures? Did the missing three slip out of the bunch, while Mr. Conger was passing them from the Government to the Town? or did they stick to the lining of his trowsers pocket?

Trial and Conviction of the Conspirators.

The trial of the conspirators commenced on the 25th ult, before the Court of the Assizes of the Seine. The indictment is very lengthy and circumstantial. The prisoners are all young men, with the exception of Pierri, who is middle aged. All seemed composed and listened with attention. Gomez denied any participation in the act, and said he only knew of it at the last moment. Rudio confessed every thing. He said he threw one bomb and incriminated the rest of the prisoners. Orsini accepted the full responsibility of the part he had taken in the affair. He confessed he wanted to kill the Emperor, and said he was ready to die. He added that he had never confided his intention to Mr. Allsop, and that M. Bernard brought the bombs to Brussels, but that he (Bernard) did not know for what purpose they were intended. He would not say as to the other prisoners. Pierri denied all participation in the conspiracy until the day the attempt was made, and then repented. Mr. Taylor, of Birmingham, maker of the bombs, did not answer to his name.

The jury gave a verdict of guilty as regards four of the accused. The Court pronounced sentence of death on Orsini, Rudio, and Pierri. Gomez is sentenced to penal servitude for life.

An immense number of arrests, it is said, have recently been made in Paris and the provinces—among them three members of the Paris bar, belonging to the republican party.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says the vote of the House of Commons on the Conspiracy to Murder bill, has produced a great sensation among all classes of people in that city, and a slight decline in the funds took place. The Moniteur published the debate which preceded the vote, in full, and simply remarked that adoption of Mr. Milner and Gibson's amendment in no manner whatever implied the rejection of the bill.

According to the Paris correspondence of Le Nord, the immediate return of the Count de Persigny to London is regarded as a proof that the Government of France does not look upon the change of the English cabinet with apprehension, or consider that the vote of the House of Commons on Friday in any respect impairs the Anglo-French Alliance.

Le Nord adds: "It is even probable that the new Cabinet, after having replied to the despatch of Count Walewski, will take the initiative in a new proposition for satisfying the reclamation of France."

Mr Persigny, the French minister, had returned to London. His movement is said to have been hastened by the reception at Paris of a despatch announcing that negociations were on foot for the reconstruction of the Palmerston Cabinet.

Trade continued dull in Paris. The corn market was quiet; but flour was rather firmer. In the south of France the corn trade was paralysed on account of over speculation.

INDIA.

The Indian mail with dates from Calcutta to the 25th, and Bombay to the 28th of January, arrived at Alexandria on the 18th of February.

Sir Colin Campbell was waiting at Cawnpore for a heavy siege train from Agra, on the arrival of which he would move with his whole forces, in concert with Jung Bahadoor, on Oude.

The Rajah of Bullubghar had been hanged at Delhi. The Military Governor of Delhi had given over charge of the city to the civil authorities.

A report was current that the Oude Zeinindars had offered to surrender on condition of immunity.

The Calpee rebels were still in force, it is said, under the leadership of Nana Sahib and were threatening in the direction of Nagotee.

The ex-King of Delhi was suffering from fever, and his trial had been postponed.

The Legislative Council had extended to Bombay an act which justifies the detention of the prisoners sought to be released by habeas corpus.

One or two small engagements and a trifling mutiny among the gunners at Saccrpore are reported.

The town and fort of Meghir had been taken from the rebels.

IMPORTANT FROM CHINA.

Occupation of Canton by the British—Capture of Commissioner Yeh and a large amount of Treasure.

The China mail has reached England. The dates are Canton, Jan. 14, and Hong Kong the 15th.

The Castanoes submitted, and evacuated the city on the 30th of December.

The Governor of Canton was taken prisoner, as well as Yeh and the Tartar General. Yeh was taken in the dress of a coolie, and sent on board the British ship Inflexible. The Governor, Pihquel, was substantially installed as Vice Governor of the city, with powers similar to those wielded by Yeh.

The allies were to continue their protectorate until satisfactory terms were made with the government of Pekin.

A commission, composed of two Englishmen and one Frenchman, had been charged with the supervision of the government; and had issued a proclamation inviting the people to return, and assuring them of their protection.

At the departure of the mail everything was quiet and there was a fair prospect of the taking off of the blockade and of the resumption of trade within a week.

In the assault upon Canton there were numerous hand to hand encounters. The British lost 100 and the French 20 in killed and wounded. A large amount of treasure was captured, but plunder was forbidden.

At Hong Kong freights were dull and easier as the tonnage was increasing.

At Shanghae a large business had been done in tea, but sales were checked by English advices. Freights were unaltered.

The New Ministry in England.

From the London Times.

We have now before us the pencilled sheet in which England submits to cram herself by way of expiating the offence of receiving an insolent despatch. It is ghastly and thin, as colorless, as devoid of substance and destitute of outline, as robes of penance ought to be. The opening one of duty, it, almost precipitancy; for in fact, all the remark it is possible to make on the programme before us is one or two of the arrangements appear able. Lord Derby is to be the Lord of the Treasury, Mr. Disraeli Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Lord Malmsbury is to resume his place at the Foreign Office. Sir F. Thesiger is to be the Lord Chancellor; and such is the general fog that has been [illegible] used by Parliament [illegible] nobody cares to ask whether, having [illegible] had a Chancery brief, he is fit for the post. Mr. Walpole, of course, is to be Home Office, and Mr. Henley at the Board of Trade. Thus, as we said before, for Minister of War we have General Peel, who will probably not have enough to occupy all his attention [illegible] possible in Her Majesty's [illegible] At the Board of Control [illegible] Lord Ellenborough [illegible] complained that the [illegible] chief was too restrictive to the [illegible] to vulgar observation, we are grossly [illegible] and kids any of his [illegible] whatever they are. To [illegible] is to be committed the [illegible] the formations of the [illegible] world. [illegible]

—leave the art of government on fifty commissions at once. Sir J. Pakington is to go to the Admiralty; Lord Hardwicke is to have the Privy Seal; Lord Colchester is to take the Post Office and Lord Salisbury is to be President of the Privy Council. Lord John Manners is to replace the present eminently practical and efficient Commissioner of Public Works; and Sir Fitzroy Kelly is to be Attorney General. It will be seen that Lord Derby has not been able to glean any assistance whatever from the other sections of the political world. He cannot show the accession of one single name from the parties by whose aid he steps into "power." The Peelites and Radicals have raised him over their head into office, but there they leave him alone in his glory. They have answered a common purpose, or gratified a common feeling, by ousting Lord Palmerston and installing Lord Derby in his place; but there ends the partnership, the dissolution of which will be gazetted in the number which announces that Lord Derby has kissed hands. The great ethical philosopher has told us that there are three kinds of friendship—that founded on the identity of principle, that of pleasure, and that for convenience. Letting alone the two former, the latter, he says, is necessarily limited by the duration of the circumstances which make the convenience. It will soon be far from convenient for Mr. Milner Gibson or Mr. Gladstone to strengthen the hands of the men who hunted down Sir R. Peel, and when that is the case they will act upon old feelings or some new convenience, and send Lord Derby back to the position in which he, at least, has so little to regret.

But was it ever proved so plain that they who were not wise before experience, will not be wise after? Lord Derby has positively lost one accession of strength since the days when he repeatedly declined the offer of power for want of men. He has not a man more than he had when he informed Her Majesty that, whatever the Irish rent goodness of his cause, he had scarcely a statesman of note on his side. All that can be said is that he has kept his flock together, a praise common to every refugee and to the lowest place wherever gravitation has free play. Either these gentlemen have immediately risen in the scale of creation or England has immensely sunk, if she accepts her new rulers without a remonstrance. We are reminded, however, that this is a moral question; nay, more, it is an affair of honor, where all ordinary estimates are out of place, and where a grain of true dignity is worth more than ship-loads of utility or genius. It is better to retrieve our honor with France under the auspices of Derby, Malmesbury, Ellenborough, Bulwer Lytton, Lord John Manners, General Peel and the rest, than to flounder on with a bankrupt character under Palmerston, Clarendon, Sir Cornewall Lewis, Sir George Grey, Sir Charles Wood, and their colleagues. We have exchanged intellectual for moral greatness, and can afford to part with the false glare of bold and constructive legislation, if we can only say that we have not pocketed an affront. For our part, we most devoutly hope that our new Ministers will not have to encounter the same trial as the last; that no scoundrel will fling an English grenade or fire an English revolver at the Emperor for the next twelve-month; that Walewski will henceforth restrict himself with suggesting topics to some fifth-rate English paper, and that the French Colonels may find a foe worthy of their prowess in the interior of Africa. We should be glad to see Lord Derby's political path laid with the softest turf, and cleared of all the dangers that proverbially lie in the course of a statesman. Yet, even at the best, we have some serious misgivings. We are far more sure of one loss than of our gain in the exchange we have just suffered. Grant that there is something low in political ability, and that intellect is of this world, yet we do not feel quite confident that the present gain of moral worth is such as to dispense with those vulgar appliances.

Nor can it be forgotten that this is a practical world. Parliament, after performing a grand act of faith in the immolation of Palmerston and his recreant colleagues, will probably spend some time, at least the fortnight's recess, in a pleasing thrill of self-complacency. It will see Britannia holding the balance, wherein Palmerston and Clarendon kick the beams, while Derby, Malmesbury, and the other champions of English honor descend with native gravity. But the grandest spectacles weary in time, and the indefatigable malice and ingenuity of politicians are sure to raise up new questions, in which old scores will be forgotten, and intellect, expediency, and such hard things once more hold sway. When this is the case—when it comes to India, to China, to Parliamentary Reform, to the consolidation of our laws, to a dozen other subjects impending over us, it remains to be ascertained whether the new Ministry will hold their own—to use the vulgar slang of secular politicians—against the old. Mere moral worth, even in the shape of a grand nationalpeasance, will not count long against either of her commercial or political utilities. It will be considered, too, that the sacrifice was performed, the virtues exhibited, and the honor acquired previous to the new Ministry, and by the act of its inauguration. So, before long, we shall be brought round to the old question—what is to be done? and the statesman who answer this most to the satisfaction of the public will be likely to carry the day. There may be no urgent demand for the India bill, and China may be resigned to the Plenipotentiaries out there; but as for this Reform bill, there seems no escaping it. What will Lord Derby do? Left to himself he would probably do what he has done before,—throw rotten boroughs, old corporations, Irish bishoprics, and nuisances of all sorts on the first rubbish heap. But will he do this now? On the great question of the year, Lord Derby will have to consult his followers, and we doubt very much whether he will be able to hit at once the convenience of those old-fashioned gentlemen and the opinion of Whigs, Radicals, and Peelites, by whose dissension alone he can hold power.

Horrible Murder by an Insane Man.

Yesterday we received intelligence of a [illegible] committed by a railway laborer on a fellow workman in open day, and under peculiarly shocking circumstances, the body of the unfortunate deceased being hacked with an axe as if it were mere cordwood! The facts which we gathered from an eye-witness of the terrible deed, are substantially as follows:—The scene of the bloody tragedy was the railway track of the Grand Trunk, Sarnia Branch, near McFayden's Saw Mill, on the 14th con. [illegible] of Plympton, Co. Lambton. It appears that a number of men were engaged in hooping, along in the employ of a Mr. Macleod, a sub-contractor under Mr. Weir, who holds a large contract from Gzowski & Co., the builders of the road for the Grand Trunk Railway. On Thursday morning last, the 4th instant, about 10 a. m., the deceased and [illegible] were engaged in clearing the track. Parties of men and three were similarly occupied at distances of from one hundred to three hundred yards. Martin Jackson, the murdered man, approached to a fire burning near Henry Hardy, (the wretched murderer) for the purpose of obtaining a light for his pipe. Hardy was also in company with another man, chopping. On attempting to take a light, Hardy exclaimed, "Leave that fire,"—and before Jackson could reply, Hardy lifted the axe with which he had been chopping, and dealt a terrible blow on the right shoulder. The deceased fell, exclaiming "murder!" The words were scarcely uttered, before the axe was brought with terrific force on the skull of the deceased, cleaving it. A second, third and fourth succeeded, completely smashing the head, and nearly severing it from the body. Of course, Jackson instantly expired. The deed—the work of a few seconds—was witnessed by several men who were working as before described. Hardy then left the spot, walking down the clearing, and approached, axe in hand, Samuel Kingston. When within a hundred yards of Kingston, Hardy hailed "Come here; in the name of Christ come to me," &c. Kingston, who had seen the deed, now ran, Hardy pursuing him with the axe. Kingston, however, warned the other men, and they all stood waiting for Hardy's approach. As he did not come, they left to take counsel what was to be done. In half an hour the men returned, and found that, in the interval, Hardy had piled cordwood over the corpse, and tried to burn it. The wood was alight when they came up. Meanwhile, Hardy went to the house of Mr. McFayden, with his axe in one hand, and the murdered man's handkerchief on the other, and tried to coax him out, crying "Come out, in the name of the children of Israel, and take my hand." McFayden told him to throw away his axe and he would. After some parley, Hardy was induced to throw his axe over the fence.—McFayden then went out, when Hardy shouted like a maniac, said he was "damned," and invited McFayden to come to see the "monster he had killed in the woods." Hardy then got over the fence and regained his axe, but a man named Timothy Russage coming up disarmed him of the weapon. The three then went up to the corpse and drew it from the fire, and afterwards coaxed the maniac to the house of Mr. Livingston, some distance off, where he was bound and delivered to the constables. The wretched man, who was quite mad and had previously had fits, behaved in a most outrageous manner, but was speedily lodged in Sarnia Jail. On Saturday last, the Coroner, Dr. T. Johnston, held an inquest over the remains of Martin Jackson, when the above facts were elicited, Dr. Buck making the post mortem. A verdict of "wilful murder" was of course returned, and the murderer committed for trial. We believe that Hardy, who was a labourer, was resident in the neighborhood, but we were not informed further about him. His victim, poor Martin Jackson, was a married man, about 35 years of age, and had been out from England about five years. He was by trade a stone mason and bricklayer. It is stated that he sent for his wife and family, who it is supposed are on their way out. Being out of work he had come through from St. Mary's (having previously been employed at Toronto), and taking a job at chopping. No reason can be assigned for the murder, the men being strangers, but the madness of Hardy. The event has thrown quite a gloom over the neighborhood where the fearful tragedy was enacted.—London Free Press.

Toronto Markets.

FRIDAY, March 12, 1858.

The supply of wheat to-day was larger than for some days past, the receipts footing up to over 3,000 bushels. Prices were much the same as previously reported, ranging from 4s 6d to 5s, for good wheat, 4s 9d and 4s 10d being freely paid for average samples. For inferior 4s was the highest price paid. The quality of the deliveries to-day was much better than usual.

In flour, the transactions are still light. We have but to reiterate our quotations of $3 60 to $3 70 for Superfine; $3 80 to $4 00, for extra.

There is no change observable in other articles.

PATENT

ARTIFICIAL STONE.

Patented March, 1857.

Ground Lime Works, Port Hope, Canada West.

THIS is a cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible, and beautiful Building material, and one which can be manufactured and used in all situations in lieu of Stone and Brick.

The Composition of the various strata of the Globe indicates the course to be pursued in Manufacturing, by artificial means, a material for Building purposes, cheap, unabsorbent, indestructible and beautiful, and the closer we follow the laws of nature the more our efforts will be crowned with success.

All material is impressed with its own peculiar affinities, must will unite and chemically combine with, and blend into one homogeneous mass, when brought into favorable contact with that material for which it has a peculiar affinity.

Sometimes, this chemical union or blending, can be effected only by the presence of a third or several materials having an affinity for each of the other two or more materials; and in the manufacture of artificial stone blocks I endeavor to follow the laws of nature, by simply bringing into contact substances which, when properly manipulated, chemically combine and form a substance quite distinct from either previous to their contact.

The numerous experiments and specimens made by me, satisfactorily demonstrate that if the constituents of any mineral body which, by nature, will chemically, or can be made to chemically combine with Lime, be mixed in true proportions, with a due amount of moisture, a union or chemical crementation of their particles will take place under a proper amount of pressure.

These artificial aggregations of particles with due amount of moisture and pressure will in a short period of time, become so undeniably near in appearance and qualities to the products of nature as not to distinguished by the eye from natural stones, and will resist all extremes of climate, forming a solid homogeneous mass they will continue to grow harder by exposure to the atmosphere, and will continue to do so either in dry or moist situations.

The advantages of this discovery may be briefly summed up as follows:—

First. The base or principal ingredient of this artificial stone can be procured in every locality.

Mortar can be made of the same composition which will be equally as cheap and much superior to common mortar, owing to the ingredients of which it is composed combining chemically.

Second. Its BEAUTY.—Buildings can be erected of the material so as to imitate the most rare and costly stones of every description, variety and color, all having an outward surface as smooth as glass, and as unabsorbent as the most polished marble.

Third. It can be made to imitate Marble, Granite, Porphery, Slate, &c., &c., of any size and form for Building, Architectural or Ornamental application, such as Walls, Columns, Cornices Chimney Tops, Roofing, Paving, Pipes, Drain Tiles, or any other Architectural Engineering, Sepulcral, Sanatory and domestic uses.

Fourth. Its DURABILITY.—It grows harder with every change of the atmosphere, and can be manufactured during all states of the weather without injuring its qualities.

Fifth. It can be applied to all species of Plastering and worked to resemble Marble in such a manner as to obtain, in a short time, a solid surface, which may be colored, painted and polished, with sufficient perfection to allow of its being used instead of the more precious marbles or stones, to form mouldings, bas reliefs, and other analagous objects of decoration.

Sixth. Its CHEAPNESS.—Buildings equal to polished marble can be erected at FIFTY PER CENT CHEAPER for the face material than any cut stone or pressed brick at present in use for face work—and when no other coloring matter is used, except the natural color of the material or base used in the composition of the artificial stone, THE PRIME COST WILL BE FIFTY PER CENT UNDER THE PRIME COST OF THE MOST COMMON BRICKS IN THE COUNTRY. Seventh. It can be manufactured by any machine which is at present in use for pressing dry clay bricks. Communications, asking further information, addressed [post-paid] to this Patentee, Joseph Ellis, will meet prompt attention.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

FRIDAY, March 12, 1858.

The paragraphs of the address were carried.

On the paragraph relative to Representation according to Population being put.

Mr. BROWN said he had intended to offer some observations; but as he had pledged himself not to do so, he would refrain, especially as it was understood that these questions would come up again. When that happened, the arguments of the hon. Attorney General might be met. He supposed that the arguments of the Attorney General were not new to any old politician; but he had shown great ingenuity to put on the matters in question a colour most creditable to himself. He only desired to make one remark. The hon member was met with cries of "Adjourn," whereupon he sat down, saying it was desirable to take the vote that evening, or the debate would be begun again on Monday, and continued for several days.

The question was then put on Mr. Brown's amendment, which was as follows—that the fourth paragraph be struck out, and the following words substituted in lieu thereof: "That while we agree with his Excellency in thinking that the statutory provisions which regulate the franchise and the trial of controverted elections are most important to the country, and require amendment, and while we shall do all in our power to improve and simplify the existing system, and to secure by law the proper registration and protection of all qualified voters,—it is at the same time our duty to state to his Excellency that there is one question surpassing in importance all others in public estimation—namely, the just representation of the people in Parliament; and that we pledge ourselves to give our earnest consideration during the present session to a measure placing Parliamentary Representation on the basis of Population without regard to a separating line between Upper and Lower Canada."

Negatived by 86 to 32.

Mr. MOWAT, moved in amendment, that all the words of the 16th Resolution, in regard to the Hudson's Bay Company and its Territory, be struck out, and the following words be substituted:—"That we will gladly receive the correspondence in relation to the Hudson's Bay Territory and the papers showing that steps have been taken by the Provincial Government for the assertion of the rights and interests of Canada in that Territory, and for their future maintainance; and we will give the most attentive consideration to the propositions made by Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, regarding that Territory, and the interests of this Province therein."

Negatived by 82 to 34.

The sixteenth paragraph was agreed to on the same division.

On motion of Atty. Gen. MACDONALD, the said Resolutions were then referred to a Select Committee to draft an Address to His Excellency in conformity thereto.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD then reported the draft of an Address in conformity with the said Resolutions; and the same being read a second time, was agreed to.

The Address was then ordered to be engrossed, and to be presented to His Excellency by the whole House, and it was ordered that such Members of the House as are of the Honorable the Executive Council, do wait upon His Excellency, to know His Excellency's pleasure, when he will be attended by the House, with its Address.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD informed the House that His Excellency would be pleased to receive the said Address on Monday, at half-past three, p. m.

The House then, at half-past one, adjourned until to-day.

THE NORFOLK SHRIEVALTY.

Monday, March 15.

Mr. FOLEY moved the appointment of a Committee to enquire into the circumstances connected with the appointment of Lawrence W. Mercer, Esq., to the office of Sheriff of the County of Norfolk.

Attorney General MACDONALD requested the mover to allow the matter to stand over for a day or two.

Mr. FOLEY, before assenting to the proposition of the hon. Attorney General, wished to state this fact, that, since he brought up this matter on Friday last, to his great surprise and to the astonishment of the inhabitants of the County of Norfolk, who were chiefly interested, the appointment of this Mr. Mercer had actually been effected, by being officially gazetted. He did think that, under the circumstances, the conduct of the Government towards the inhabitants of Norfolk, and towards himself and hon. gentlemen on his side, had been anything but courteous and proper. (Hear, hear.) He would say further, he had documentary and verbal evidence to establish the fact that the Attorney General was aware of the circumstances connected with the matter, (hear, hear.) Since the subject last came up in this House, he had visited the County of Norfolk, and he was satisfied, if the Government were aware of the state of feeling which existed there, it would not be treated in the cavalier manner it was. Unfortunately, although he and his friends in the House constituted a majority of the Upper Canada members, they were not in a position to exercise control over their own affairs. The Government had not only legislative, but administrative functions to discharge, and when they found the administration of the affairs of Upper Canada conducted by a Lower Canada majority against the wish of an Upper Canada majority, so as to result in appointments of this nature, wherein vices, immorality, and improprieties of the grossest description were perpetrated, he thought that when this aggrieved, they had a right to complain. The majority of the Upper Canada members had declared their want of confidence in the Upper Canada members of the Government—they expected no justice from them—but they appealed with greater confidence to the members for Lower Canada to extend to them that justice which the Government denied. What were the facts? As he had stated them the other night, and as they were patent on the public record of the country, they amounted to this—that a bargain and sale had taken place—that an important public office had been bought and sold for a pecuniary consideration, (hear, hear.) And when they brought this most grave matter before the House, they were obstructed by the Upper Canada section of the Government, who appeared to hold office for the purpose of thwarting the wishes of the people of Upper Canada. When he brought the subject up before, he might have availed himself on the part of the inhabitants of the county of Norfolk to prove the truth of the facts alleged. He was asked to postpone it and it was promised that the correspondence which had taken place with the Government should be laid on the table. Having postponed it at the request of the Attorney General, he now brought it forward, and was again told that the Government were not yet prepared to meet the matter. He had stated that he was prepared to prove the grossest corruption, and at the very time the discussion in the House was going on, the act of which he complained was perfected, by the person being gazetted? Having visited Norfolk, he learned that the truth was that the deputation from that county came to Toronto for the purpose of having an interview with the Governor General—that they were with the attempts of the late Sheriff of Norfolk to dispose of the shrievalty to persons in his county, but he might mention, incidentally, that such attempts were made. Unfortunately, as it had since turned out, the Deputy Sheriff of Welland was the only person who could be found to take the office on the terms proposed. The arrangement made between the Sheriff of Norfolk and Mr. Mercer was, that the Sheriff should resign, and that Mr. Mercer should succeed him on paying a pecuniary consideration, £5,000, he (Mr. Foley) thought he should be able to show it must be remembered that this transaction was effected without the knowledge of the inhabitants of the county so much interested in the affair. He was told that certain recommendations were made by two or three persons in the county; but when he be mentioned to the Attorney General the position in which those parties stood in regard to the newly appointed Sheriff, he thought the Attorney General would agree with him that, to say the least of it, the Attorney General had been most grossly imposed upon. After the appointment was absolutely made, the friends of the newly appointed Sheriff, feeling satisfied that he was secure in his office, not only boasted of the manner in which they had effected his appointment, but went so far as to give a statement of the facts in relation to it. As soon as it was ascertained in the county of Norfolk that the arrangement was completed, a public meeting was held, to the proceedings of which he called the attention of the House. The meeting was called and presided over by the Warden, who was a friend of the Government. At the meeting, which was held in the Court House and which was numerously attended, the following resolutions were adopted:—"Resolved,—That we have reason to believe that the late Sheriff, H. V. A. Rapelje, Esq., has disposed of his office to the newly appointed Sheriff, L. W. Mercer, for a compensation, and we look upon such sale of office as base, corrupt, and highly injurious to public morality." "Resolved,—That this meeting utterly disapproves of the appointment of L. W. Mercer to the office of Sheriff for this county, and that the Chairman, and Messrs. Simpson, McCall, J. N. Vanblricker, F. G. Stanton, John A. Abbott, John Robins, W. T. Wilson, and D. W. Freeman, be a committee to draft a petition to his Excellency the Governor General to request the appointment as one utterly distasteful to the people of the county of Norfolk, and subversive of justice and right." When the matter was brought up the other night, he (Mr. Foley) understood the Attorney General to say that the only complaint made to him when the subject was presented to him, was that the person appointed was a non-resident in the county; but so far from that being correct, if the information which he (Mr. Foley) had received could be relied upon, a memorial founded upon the resolutions which he had just read was prepared, and a deputation proceeded to Toronto for the purpose of communicating with his Excellency the Governor General on the subject. They had a conference with the Attorney General respecting it, and, as he was by them instructed, they were promised by the Attorney General a full investigation into the matter; but from that day up to the 8th of March, he did not communicate with them either directly or indirectly. The appointment actually took place at the very time that the inhabitants of the county were under the impression that the government were investigating the matter. At their urgent solicitation he (Mr. Foley) moved for the appointment of a committee of the House to inquire into the affair, and he was met by the Attorney General (very courteously and cordially it was true) with the promise of an investigation. At the instance of the Attorney General he postponed his resolution for a committee of inquiry; but to his great indignation and surprise he found in the Gazette of Saturday last, the appointment to the shrievalty of Norfolk, of the very Mr. Mercer who, as he (Mr. Foley) had informed the government from his place in Parliament, he was prepared to prove both by public records as well as by private evidence, had received this office for a pecuniary consideration. He would now call the attention of the House to the reply given to the memorialists by the Provincial Secretary. After acknowledging the receipt of the memorial, the Provincial Secretary said,—"I am directed to state for the information of the parties interested, that the appointment of Mr Mercer to the office in question, was not made without due consideration, and that His Excellency has every reason to believe that that gentleman will prove himself well qualified to hold it." His Excellency was thus made to say that the appointment was not made without due consideration, and that Mr. Mercer was well qualified to hold the office.

Mr. TACKETTE—Is he not well qualified.

Mr. FOLEY—So far as he was not well qualified. No man in so solar transgressed the rules of morality and right—no man who, under circumstances such as had transpired in this case, could go and, by corrupt and fraudulent means, induce another to transfer an office of so great importance, was fit to fill such a post as that of Sheriff of the County of Norfolk, which this gentleman

THE GENERAL ELECTION COMMITTEE.

Monday, March 15.

Mr. NORMAN moved that this House disapproves of the warrant of the hon. the Speaker appointing the hon. John Sandfield Macdonald, member for the town of Cornwall; the hon. T. J. J. Loranger, member for the county of Laprairie; Joseph Hartman, Esq., member for the North Riding of the county of York; Joseph Edouard Turcotte, Esq., member for the county of Champlain; James Moir Ferres, Esq., member for the county of Prescott; and Angus Morrison, Esq., member for the North Riding of the county of Simcoe, to be members of the General Committee of Elections for the present Session, and laid on the table of this House, on the eleventh day of the present month, but in so far only as the said Warrant relates to and appoints the said hon. Thomas J. J. Loranger to be a member of the said Committee. The hon. gentleman said he believed there were no less than thirty-two members in the House whose elections were contested, and the country took a good deal of interest in them. He understood that it had not been the practice of the House to allow any member of the Administration to serve upon the Election Committee. Out of the Committee of six now chosen, four of them had never honoured the Opposition side of the House with their confidence and support, and as they (the Opposition) were in a minority on the Committee, they thought the hon. Provincial Secretary should be relieved of those duties which had been placed upon him by the Speaker (perhaps without the consideration of the position he occupied) and conferred upon some member on the opposition side of the House.

Attorney General MACDONALD objected to the hon. gentleman saying that the appointment had been made without the due consideration. If there was one thing more than another in which the Speaker was bound to act with consideration, it was in this matter, and he thought, unless the hon. member for North Wentworth could stand up in his place, and say that the nomination was a corrupt one, the House was bound to support it.

Mr. NORMAN assured the House that he had no intention to insult the Speaker, or to insinuate in any way that he had been actuated in the nomination by party motives.

Hon. Attorney General MACDONALD was glad to hear the explanations, but insisted that as the law had placed the nomination of the election committee in the hands of the Speaker, rather than in the House, they were bound to respect his decision. And in the questioning of that decision, an accusation was implied. The hon. gentleman then pointed out more instances in the English Parliament, where members of the Cabinet had been placed on election committees.

Mr. DOUTON said that the law gave them a right to make such a motion as that of the hon. member for North Wentworth had made, so that no accusation against the Speaker was implied. Whatever might be the precedents set in England, the precedents set in this House since the law came into operation were in favour of placing the oldest members of the House upon the election committees; those who by their experience were best qualified to give judicial opinions. To prove this the hon. gentleman produced lists from the year 1851 to 1856, in which the rule held good, but of the present members he saw only two of the old and experienced in the list. Last parliament his own name had been placed upon the election committee, but was afterwards struck out, because the seat of his brother was contested, and he did not think the Speaker considered it a token of disrespect. If the position of the Provincial Secretary were looked at with regard to those of his colleagues whose seats were contested, it would appear a good reason why the hon. gentleman should himself not desire to remain on the committee, so that no imputation might be cast upon him in the future.

Mr. AIKIN would move that all after the word "that" be struck out, and words inserted disapproving of the entire warrant.

Mr. W. POWELL thought the gentleman, if serious, should assume the duties of Speaker, and name the committee at once. It was said that there were six members on the committee, and only two of the Opposition; but the Opposition were not a third of the House. Besides, where was all the boasted experience on the other side, and when want of experience was objected to the committee, it ought to be remembered that in the last parliament the member for Montreal, who had never been in parliament at all was put on the warrant, without objection on that ground at all. He thought the selection a good one and would support it, seeing no objection to Ministers being on the committee.

Mr. MOWAT did not not think that the fact of the House having a preponderance of Ministerial members gave that side any right to have that preponderance on the committee. The spirit of the election law was impartiality; but to place four members of the Ministerial side on the committee was the same as taking all six from the Ministerial side of the House, for a majority of four could do what they pleased.

M. HOGAN said that he conceived that if a criminal trial were to take place it would be held to be most unjust to place on a jury four men known to be opposed to him and two against him. He did not know how the minority were regarded on the other side of the House; but on his side of the House they did regard with astonishment the spectacle of the Ministry voting down the right of petition, in one of the most extraordinary cases which ever came before Parliament. After this men like his self, whose election was protested against could not but feel great apprehension when their case was to be tried by men who had already followed such conduct in the House.

Att. Gen. MACDONALD—They want to have four on their side.

Sol. Gen. ROSE held that there were three grounds for resisting this motion—1st. That it implied a censure of the Speaker's discernment; 2nd, because it implied a grave censure against the Provincial Secretary; and 3rd, because it implied a grave censure upon the committee who would be appointed.

Mr. BROWN could not by any means agree with what had fallen from the Solicitor General. He thought it singular indeed, that the hon. gentleman should profess such horror at the motion of his hon. friend, when that motion was expressly provided for in the statute. It declared that whenever the list sent down by the Speaker was unacceptable, "the House should disapprove of any such warrant." What was the use of such a provision, if it was not to be exercised, and when had a case ever arisen calling so loudly for interference? They deemed not that the Speaker may have acted conscientiously, but they thought he had acted wrong, and they had too much at stake to hesitate about saying so. It had been asked on the other side why was the name of the Provincial Secretary alone selected for disapproval? The answer was plain enough. The Opposition were prepared to take exception either to particular names or to the whole warrant. The Opposition heartily supported the amendment of the hon. member for Peel, and he hoped the House would sustain it; but there was a good reason why the name of the Provincial Secretary should be specially excepted; and that was because he was a member of a Government, four of whose members had their seats in contestion. Was it right that a gentleman so situated, should be entrusted with the appointment of committees which are to try four of his colleagues? There were seven members of the Government in the House, and four of them were petitioned against.

Hon. Mr. SICOTTE—Only two.

Mr. BROWN—There is the Attorney General East, the Commissioner of Public Works, the Inspector General—

Mr. SICOTTE—Is there a petition against the Inspector General?

Mr. BROWN said it was on the way, and would be laid on the table in due time. The Solicitor General, also, was petitioned against. And was it right that the cases of four members of the Government—three in the Cabinet, and out-side—should be left to the adjudication of jurors selected by one of their colleagues, backed up by three of their supporters, in a committee of six? Four, of course, would have the determination, just as much as if the whole six had been chosen from that side. The course taken by Mr. Speaker, he ventured to say, had never been pursued in England. He did not believe a Minister of the Crown had ever been put on an Election Committee which was to determine the right to a seat of one of his colleagues, much less of four colleagues. As there might be some new members of the House who did not know the important functions which pertained to the General Committee on Elections, he might state that this Committee selected the members of the House to sit on the different Election Committees. They first selected six or more gentlemen to form the chairman's panel—and from these must be selected every chairman of the Select Election Committees. They could pick out for this purpose whomsoever they choose.

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON—And those chairmen have two votes.

Mr. BROWN—Yes! The chairman had a deliberative as well as a casting vote. Then they divided all the members of the House into three lists or panels. The order of these panels being arranged by the House, they were sent back to the Committee, and from them were selected, without check or control, the members whom they saw fit to put on the Special Committees.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD—Suppose there is a desire to be corrupt. The Committee, when the first case comes up, choose four of the friends of the party whom they wish to favor. In the next case, they choose four more, but at this rate they would soon leave on the panel the names only of the opposite party.

Mr. BROWN—Suppose they did, and out of 130 members, left all the Opposition to the end! The Attorney General confesses they could do this—and only fancy a Committee having the power here described!—the power to select all of the first Committees from the ministerial side, and leave the minority in the cold shade. It was quite clear that into the hands of the four gentlemen selected from the other side by Mr. Speaker, was to be entrusted the decision of the right of all claimants to the 32 seats now contested, and these four as strong partizans of the Government as were in the House. Was there a stronger man on that side than the member for Simcoe (Mr. Morrison)? If he were to select a Committee to decide on his (Mr. B.'s) seat, could he avoid acting with a party feeling? Had not the House observed the delight with which the hon. gentleman had got up to present the petition complaining of his (Mr. B.'s) return? Or, if the member for Brome (Mr. Ferres) had to select a Committee for him, how could he act? For one, he had a thorough appreciation of how that hon. member would act. He trusted the member for Champlain (Mr. Turcotte) would endeavour to act fairly, but he, too, was a strong partizan, and might possibly be biassed by party feeling. The Speaker could not, in fact, have picked out from the House four stronger partizans. (Hear, hear.) And he had made them the majority of the Committee, while there had never before been a General Election Committee appointed on which an equal number was not given to both sides of the House, whatever be the proportions of the two parties. (Hear, hear.) That was the rule when the present Commissioner of Crown Lands (Mr. Sicotte) and also, when his hon. friend, the member for Cornwall (Mr. J. S. Macdonald) sat in that chair. When the Opposition were a small minority, they had an equal number on the Election Committee—and now, when so far as Upper Canada was concerned, they were a majority, why had a change in the systems ought to be made, and the power of determining the election contests, some of them, like his own, trumped up for party purposes—thrown entirely into party hands?

Sol. Gen. ROSE—You are not singular in that.

Mr. BROWN—Were they to depart from the rule which had always been observed in England and in this country, of giving both sides an equal number on the committee, would they send it forth to the country that they were about to follow up systematically the course so audaciously pursued by the Government in throwing out the Russell petition. Possibly gentlemen opposite might succeed in the desperate game they were playing—they might succeed by this system, in driving hon. members from their seats by party votes, but they might rest assured the country would pronounce their verdict on it all. (Hear, hear.) He cautioned hon. gentlemen to beware how they permitted such a reproach to be cast upon the House as would be the sustaining of this warrant. The Opposition were entitled to have got half the Committee—it had always been so—the law went on that supposition—and if a new ruling were attempted to be forced on them, the country would hold, and hold justly that it was done for party ends. He left the matter in the hands of the House, appealing to the honour of hon. gentlemen on that side as well as on his own to give at least fair play. (Cheers.)

Mr. PATRICK said that the charge of partiality came not from the Opposition, but from the Ministry against the Opposition, otherwise why did they object to an impartial distribution?

Hon. Mr. CAUCHON did not say it was just to say that an appeal against the decision of the Speaker, in a case like this, was any attack upon his honour. Otherwise, why did the law give this appeal to the House? It would be as well to say that a suitor rejected in a Court where he appealed to the Court above. There was no doubt of the integrity of the gentlemen named in the committee; but it was hard to say that no appeal could be had, when no personal spirit of party feeling entering into the choice of the committees. If the Speakers had always hitherto named an equality from each side of the House, it was because the mere letter of the law was not considered to afford sufficient protection. He did not fear for his election; but he knew how far men's wills were swayed by their feelings. If the member for Montreal was formerly appealed against because his brother was petitioned against, how much greater reason was there for appealing against Mr. Loranger, three of whose colleagues were appealed against. But it was absurd to say that a minister of the Crown was not more liable to be biassed than others. Every one knew that his interest in the case was greater than that of other members.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD pointed out that there never had been a case before in which the Committee had not been struck equally from both sides of the House; and he pointed out that in his own case, how he had always observed the rule. He was sorry that rule had been departed from, and regretted that he had great reason to fear that his influence on this Committee would be good for very little.

Mr. TURCOTTE said he had served twice on the Committee, and had never yet heard of an objection or a division on the Committee. He did not know what the hon. member for Montreal meant, when he said that this Committee had every contested election in their hands. Did the hon. member think that the members on that side of the House were capable of committing perjury?

Mr. BROWN—It is not perjury to choose such a man as the members of the Committee have confidence in themselves.

Mr. TURCOTTE—It would be perjury if they chose men to favour one of either side. The gentlemen must suppose that the gentlemen on the Ministerial side could commit perjury, and that they themselves could do so too.

Mr. BROWN—Why have you this time changed the invariable rule?

Mr. TURCOTTE—The Speaker thought he might do it, because there never had been any difficulty about the nomination of this Committee. It was the same thing when you had the hon. member for Cornwall as Chairman. He had a casting vote, and thus there was always a majority on the committee.

Mr. FOLEY contended that if any imputation had been cast upon the Speaker, it had come from the other side of the House, who had justified his nomination, on the ground that he had made them according to the numbers of the majority and the minority in the House. The Speaker ought not to know either majority or minority, and he thought no grosser imputation could have been thrown upon the Speaker than that which has been thus fastened upon him. After some further observations upon the unfairness of the arrangement of the committee, the hon. gentleman went on to say that notwithstanding his respect for the Speaker, he could not disguise it from himself or from the House, that after all there was a great deal of cause for apprehension of injustice on the part of the Opposition. The country had seen men placed in the House by unfair means, and then keeping themselves there through means of Election Committees, which followed out the commands of a corrupt Government. There was the well known case of Mr. Munro, who, with a large majority of seven hundred, was kept out of Parliament on a paltry question of a property qualification, though it was a great question whether Mr. Small had any qualification at all. In spite of all this, Mr. Small was kept for a long time sitting in his place to the detriment and injury of the entire country.

Mr. SICOTTE—Oh!

Mr. FOLEY—The hon. Crown Lands Commissioner should not say Oh! The time he (Mr. Foley) spoke of, the Hon. Crown Lands Commissioner would have agreed with every word he said, and would have been a thousand times more indignant than he. The acts of which he spoke were directed against the Opposition, led by the Hon. Mr. Baldwin and the Hon. Mr. Lafontaine against the friends at that time of the Crown Lands Commissioner, and yet that gentleman now found himself sitting by the side of those very men who were guilty of such vile outrages upon his own friends; and he was even ready to sustain them again in equally scandalous proceedings. Did not the hon. member recollect the Montreal election, in which men who were placed on that floor by the most outrageous violence and fraud, were sustained by these scandalous acts of Election Committees? He did not say the hon. gentlemen opposite would do such things; but there had been such numerous instances of injustice before that there was ground to fear the worst might happen again. Had not gentlemen seen a member of Election Committee, Mr. Roblin, bought off by an offer of three offices, and thus induced to break up the Committee, leaving in the House a man who possessed no title to be there, and now when the Upper Canadian branch of the Ministry was kept in power solely by the Lower Canadian vote, and not the majority from Upper Canada, a right to call on the Lower Canadians at any rate to see justice done on all sides? Had they not a right to do all in their power to prevent the recurrence of scenes so disgraceful for that House. He did not mean to include all the gentlemen opposite in the reflection he had made. He believed, from what he had seen of the hon. Crown Lands Commissioner as well in the chair as in the House, he was far from believing him capable of being governed by aught else than principle, and his sense of justice. The hon. member's course on the Election Committees, in direct opposition to most of his colleagues, was the best evidence of his integrity. Every word that hon. member had spoken on these subjects, had been in favor of honesty. But coming back to the real point in dispute, he asked whether there could be any wrong done by granting this equality? Surely, if the House was to believe in the integrity of one side, it might do so in that of the other, and so let the Opposition have the same strength on the Committee which was always accorded them both here and in England.

Mr. I. BUCHANAN conceived that the doctrine enunciated by the hon. member for Peel was a very strange one, and did not agree with that gentleman that improper motives could justly be imputed to the hon. Provincial Secretary, merely because he was a minister of the Crown, and because the returns of four of his colleagues were protested. The returns of nearly all the colleagues of the hon. member for Cornwall were protested also. On the other hand, he could not approve the idea of the hon. member for Carleton, that because the minority had only one-third in the House, they should have one-third on the Election Committee. It seemed to him that was just because the majority was strong that they ought to give the minority an equality. It must be seen, moreover, that there could be no good grounds for imputing unfair motives to the Speaker, because at the time this Committee was struck there had been no strictly party vote taken. But he could not, as an honest man, approve the composition of the Committee, and he must say that he felt as if he were in the minority he would refuse to serve on the Committee at all unless there was a fair equality maintained between the two sides of the House.

The vote was then taken as follows upon Mr. Aikins amendment:—

THE MUNICIPAL LAW.

FRIDAY, March 19.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD before the adjournment, asked leave to introduce the Government bill for amending and consolidating the Municipal Laws of Upper Canada.

Hon. J. S. MACDONALD said he was opposed to the Government carrying on any legislation, so long as they did not possess the confidence of the people of Upper Canada. He meant to vote against every measure they introduced.

The bill having been read the first time,

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD moved that it be read a second time on Tuesday.

Mr. BROWN suggested that a later day should be fixed. Very many people throughout the country were interested in the bill, and it would be well if such a day was fixed for the discussion as would allow the Reeves, Wardens, and other Municipal officers throughout Upper Canada, to communicate on the subject with members of the House.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD said that the bill had been prepared by the Commissioners for revising the Statutes, and, after being laid by them on the table of the House, was sent to the Wardens and Reeves and other officers throughout the country. Many valuable suggestions had in consequence been received, and many more, he had no doubt, would be made by members of the House. He proposed after the second reading, to send it to a Committee, composed of Wardens and other members possessed of municipal experience, who, with the aid of the learned members for South Ontario and South Oxford, would consider all the suggested improvements. He supposed that thereafter the bill should be sent back to the Commissioners for Revising Statutes, who should incorporate it into those amendments in the same style as characterized the rest of the document, so that, when completed it would be a fair specimen of what might be expected from the labours of those Commissioners.

The Attorney General concluded by moving the second reading for Friday, the 9th of April.

Hon J. S. MACDONALD said that, but for the illness of the Speaker and the desire of the House to adjourn, he should have called for the yeas and nays. But he told the Government that hereafter, so long as they did not represent the feelings of Upper Canada, he for one, should vote against every measure they introduced in reference to that section of the Province.

THE NORFOLK SHRIEVALTY.

Mr. FOLEY complained that, notwithstanding the promise given more than a week ago, that the papers connected with the appointment of Mr. Mercer to the Shrievalty of Norfolk, would be brought down, they were not yet laid on the table.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD said that that must have arisen from an oversight. Since the matter was before the House he had seen the Sheriff, who had not the slightest objection to the fullest investigation being made into the whole transaction.

Mr FOLEY then moved the appointment of a committee of seven members to enquire into the circumstances of Mr. Mercer's appointment, and of the alleged bargain and sale by which he obtained the office.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD objected to the composition of the committee, and desired that the motion should be postponed till the hon. member had an opportunity of consulting him on the subject.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

THE OCCURRENCES ON ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

Mr. MCGEE, before the Speaker left the Chair, wished to bring before the House a matter of privilege. He said he would be one of the last men to complain of any violence offered to him in the streets of Toronto. But, because there was some excitement abroad, and because the fact of his bringing it here thus publicly under the attention of the Attorney General West might tend to allay the excitement which he had reason to believe did exist to some extent in the city, he had thought it incumbent upon him to take that course. On Wednesday night last, being St. Patrick's Anniversary, in returning from a dinner party where he was an invited guest, at eleven o'clock, in the carriage in which he came to this House from Colborne-street was besieged, some stones were thrown, the driver was knocked from his seat, and a party of 40 or 50, perhaps more, followed him to the vicinity of the House. So far as he was personally concerned, he had the same scorn of midnight riots as of anonymous letter-writers, and it was not for the purpose of throwing himself on the protection of the House, that he brought up this matter. But he had learned since, that, subsequently to leaving the dinner party, the lower story of the building was gutted by those parties, and that a portion of them proceeded to Sworth's Hotel, where he had put up, and enquired in the fiercest manner whether he was in the house, and made other offensive demonstrations. On the same day, an unfortunate occurrence took place on the street, which resulted in the death to-day at the Hospital, of the person wounded. The City Council were to have met last night, took so little interest in the matter, that there was not a quorum present. To-day they met and adjourned without doing anything. Now he was afraid that, if a portion of the people got the impression that the City Government would not act, they might be tempted to make reprisals, which would be as much to be condemned, as the original provocation. He mentioned the matter as one of privilege, that the attention of the highest law-officer of the Crown might be directed to it, and in the belief that a statement by the Attorney General might tend to allay the excitement, by giving parties an assurance that justice would be done in the premises, and would so prevent them from taking the law into their own hands.

Atty. Gen. MACDONALD said that, if any hon. member was assaulted or annoyed in coming or going from the House, or in consequence of anything he had said in the House, the parties so assaulting or annoying him, were guilty of a gross breach of the privileges of the House, and ought to be dealt with accordingly. One of the first things about which the House should be jealous, was the preservation of its own independence. He had no doubt this House was ready to vindicate its privileges and to extend its protection to every one of its members. He was sure every one must lament the unfortunate casualty—the homicide of the person stabbed on Wednesday. It was a matter that could not be passed over, but would be most strictly investigated. It would of course, be the duty of the Law Officers of the Crown, and the Peace officers of the city, to see that the law was vindicated and the offenders duly punished. The hon. gentleman had spoken of the City Council, but he was of course aware, that that was not a judicial body; and that the law-officers of the Crown could exercise no authority over it. He had already given instructions for a strict investigation to be held in the matter, and at the Coroner's Inquest the Government would have counsel present to watch the proceedings and to see that justice was done. If any further excitement was apprehended the Government would of course call the attention of all the Peace Officers and Justices of the Peace in the city to the necessity for taking measures to preserve the public peace, and measures would no doubt be taken to prevent the recurrence of such scenes during the sitting of Parliament. He was himself very much a stranger in Toronto, and he was not aware whether there was any degree of excitement in the city. The homicide which had occurred was of course calculated to cause excitement, but no effort would be wanting on the part of the Government to prevent a disturbance of the public peace, if such investigation should be necessary.

Mr. BROWN said the statement made by the Attorney General must be satisfactory to the House. For his own part, he was quite certain he spoke the sentiments of the whole citizens of Toronto, of whatever shade of opinion, when he said that the deepest regret was experienced on account of the incidents which occurred on St. Patrick's day. At the same time, he was glad to find that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McGee) had not stated that what had occurred was in consequence of anything which had passed in this House, (hear, hear.) He had heard many of the citizens of Toronto express the deepest regret that any gentleman coming to this city, especially to be engaged in the discharge of public business, should have been in the slightest degree interfered with. Every gentleman coming here as a representative of the people, should feel himself at liberty to express his sentiments boldly, and to walk the streets of the city as freely, and with as little danger, as any of its residents. He was sure that was the sentiment of the people of Toronto, and that such an occurrence as had been brought before the House only required to be made public, to make the citizens feel it a point of honour that strangers should have here that full security to which they were entitled. They must all regret the unfortunate circumstances under which a man lost his life on Wednesday, but it was well to know that religious animosities had nothing to do with that occurrence—the death of the unfortunate man having, it was believed, been caused by one who entertained the same religious opinions. It was not, therefore, calculated to create any bad feeling. He was not aware of the existence of any great excitement in the city, but he was quite sure that the active and energetic officer at the head of the civic government, Mr. Boulton, would take every step that was necessary for the preservation of the public peace, (hear, hear.)

The House then adjourned at a few minutes after ten.

THE ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH.

From the Times' Correspondent.)

PARIS, Thursday, Feb. 25, 6 P. M.

Although it was generally known that the Assize Court would be accessible to no one who was not provided with a ticket, or at least that the space reserved for ordinary spectators would be extremely restricted, and that the chances of admission were very slight indeed, yet neither that nor the intense cold prevented crowds moving in a continuous stream towards the Palace of Justice from the early hour of this morning. At 8 o'clock many squads of sergens de ville and detachments of the city guard arrived and took up their posts inside and out. After making their way through the rather motley crew which thronged the purlieus of the building where Justice holds her principal seat, and which is par excellence called the "Palace," they cleared as gently as possible under the circumstances the space near the doors, and forced the lingering groups unfurnished with passes into the Salle des Pas Perdus, or vast hall which serves as the haunt for idlers, and a promenade for lawyers whose reputation if yet for in the future, or for the old stagers who have no immediate business before the Court. Here young advocates in the professional gown and toque mingled with such citizens as had the courage to leave their beds at so early an hour, sauntered, chatted, and laughed; others stood or sat apart on a retired bench, and seemed earnestly discussing the case that was to come before the court, the probability of some great scandal occurring during the trial, the chance of mysterious disclosures which men in the desperate condition of the prisoners might be likely to make, the comparative guilt of the accused, the great talents of the Counsel employed on both sides, and even the ability, or the contrary, of the presiding Judge. There were a few men with the portfolio, which is carried here, instead of bags, to hold the dossier under their arm, and with "spectacles on nose," deep in the study of legal papers. You could easily distinguish those who had tickets and those who had none by the satisfied expression of their face, and the cag-mess with which the latter tried to discover some unnoticed cleft in the mass to baffle the policemen on duty. Those who had passes were obliged to keep them open in their hands, so as to be admitted without delay. They were arranged in groups, and each group consigned to the place already marked for it. The tickets resembled those for admission to a theatre, and were numbered and lettered so as to correspond with the seats or standing ground set apart for the public within the court.

At 9 o'clock precisely the doors were thrown open. There was no rush, no tumult, no wild efforts to dart along. The groups that were nearest the doors were allowed to pass in an orderly manner on showing their cards, and once past the door-keepers were shown by the officials to the place already marked for them. Yet so continuous was the flow that in less than half an hour the large court was almost full, and about half-past 9 the batteries, however distinguished they might be by the external signs of rank, were unable to get further than the door in spite of the good will of the doorkeepers. It would occupy too much space to give the names of the distinguished persons who were present. Nearly every member of the diplomatic corps, and all the high-est functionaries in the Administration and the Court, attended. Of the members of the Imperial household there were Gen. Fleury, M. Valabregue, M. Konigswater, M. Chasseloup-Laubat, and various other members of the Legislative Corps.

At a quarter past 10 the burly form of Marshal Magnan was recognized among the crowd, and almost at the same time the prisoners were introduced. Each was led by two gendarmes, and were placed in order after each other:—Orsini, Rudio, Pierri, and Gomez. Their appearance, as might be expected, drew off attention from every other part to fix on them. Every eyeglass and opera-glass was directed to the bench of the accused, and particularly to Orsini. The prisoners were dressed in black, but this was the only resemblance between them. Of the four, Orsini is certainly most worthy of remark. He is of middle stature, rather stout, full in face as in body. Without being what may be called distingue his bearing at all events contrasts with that of his companions, and gives him the air of a man of the superior classes. He wore neither beard nor moustache, but only whiskers. If he wore a white neckcloth instead of a black one he would be taken for an advocate or an avoue, or an employe of the upper ranks.

The reading of the acte d'accusation, which lasted until nearly 12 o'clock was listened to with the greatest attention, but the report of Doctor Tardieu, which states that the number of wounded was 511, created a profound sensation. When the acte d'accusation was read the list of witnesses was called over. The enacisted appearance of several of those persons, many of whom are still forced to use crutches, created a very painful sensation in the Court.

The examination of the prisoners then began. Gomez was the first examined. We have already seen from the indictment he has made a full confession of the crime; though in his confession he persisted to-day, yet what he said was occasionally marked with contradiction and reserve. On coming to the date of the 14th January he admitted that he was at Orsini's house at 6 p. m., when the final meeting of the conspirators was held, that he had served them with mulled Bordeaux wine, that he had gone out with them having a bomb and a revolver in his possession which had been given him by Orsini; but at the same time he declared that he was completely ignorant of what he was to do with the projectile or the weapon, and if he flung the bomb under the Emperor's carriage he only obeyed his master's orders.

"How"—exclaimed the President—"how is it possible you could consider such an order one to be obeyed?" Gomez made no reply to the question, though it was repeated twice or thrice. He broke silence only to reply to a question as to the pistol of which he was the bearer. He said he was utterly ignorant whether it was loaded or otherwise, nor did he know who loaded it. The President observed that the innocence to which he laid claim was contradicted by Orsini himself, who in his examination said that Gomez should not be considered as a child, and that he knew very well why he had been brought to Paris. To that he replied, "M. Orsini may say what he pleases." The President directed his attention to the letter of the 9th of October, spoken of in the examination, in which he declared his entire devotedness to Orsini and his plots in favour of the cause of Italy. Gomez remained silent.

The examination of Rudio then commenced. Rudio had almost made a complete confession, and he on this occasion repeated it. While Rudio was in England, notwithstanding his being a professor of languages, he was nearly starving. He was in this position when he met Bernard, to whom he applied for employment, and who promised to secure him some. Pierri, to whom Bernard recommended him, promised him 336 francs, and 2s. a-week for his wife if he would follow him to Paris, which he did, and when there he told him what he was to do. The matter appeared to him to be too serious, but he found himself committed, and his amour propre would not permit him to recede. At the conclusion of his interrogatory the President said to him:—

"You belong to an honourable family, but you were expelled from school for your bad conduct, and then from step to step you became an assassin for 336 francs."

These words then produced a profound sensation. Orsini was then interrogated:

THE PRESIDENT.—You first made admissions, and then you retracted them. Finally, on the 9th of February you addressed a letter to the Attorney General in which you protest your innocence.

ORSINI.—I have in fact an explanation to give. I have long endeavored to effect the independence of my country, and this idea has occupied my mind without any feeling of hatred against France being mixed up with it. All my hatred was against the Austrians, who since 1815 have never ceased to persecute us and plunder us. I have never ceased to struggle against Austrian domination, and this is the only crime of which I have been guilty. In 1848 I hoped with all Italy that the end of Austrian domination had arrived. A Constituent Assembly having been convoked at Rome I was elected to form part of it. There seeing a French army landed, we thought it came as a friend, but when we saw it came as an enemy we were painfully astonished. An engagement having placed a certain number of French soldiers in our hands, we took advantage of an Armistice which the French General accorded us to restore him his prisoners. This surrender took place at the advanced posts to the cry of "Vive la France! Vive l'Italie!" At a later period every one knows how the engagements, the promises and the armistice were kept. But in spite of that the political men who then directed affairs at Rome did not cease to show attachments towards France, so persuaded were we all that that war was the act of the Government and not of the nation.

THE PRESIDENT.—The freedom allowed to the defence ought to make us tolerate such words; but we will revert to them.

ORSINI.—Be it so; but if I be allowed to explain I shall do so with the same moderation I have hitherto shown. To return to our sentiments towards France. I will say we consider her as so foreign to what passed at Rome, that in all the conspiracies which have taken place at Rome since the duration of the occupation, measures were always taken and orders given that in case of execution or in case of success the French armies should be spared. The fall of the Roman Republic becoming an accomplished fact, I have not ceased to labor for the liberation of my country. Instead of placing myself, as Mazzini, in the way of conspiracies, which sends out a score or so of armed men in the street, where they were stupidly shot down, I wished at first to pursue my object by legal means. When in England I wrote and spoke to the public in favor of political intervention. I applied to the authorities, and addressed petitions to the Queen for the same purpose. Seeing that all those steps ended in nothing, the faith I had in my cause urged me to find out the reasons for my failure. I will now detail the reasons which convinced me that the Emperor Napoleon has an interest diametrically opposed to the independence of Italy. Once convinced that this was the great stumbling block to our independence, I then confessed that I resolved to kill him. I make this avowal frankly. I should have preferred executing this design at me, but close access to the Emperor was not easy, and I was therefore obliged to seek associates. After having approved my plans and given their consent and assistance these men abandon me to-day, and it is their testimony which has led to my capture. You have also your reproach. I will not recriminate on them. I pardon them, and I offer my head as a sacrifice to my country. Before my judges I will only occupy myself with one thing—my character. Let me not be judged by the declarations of these men. I do not accuse them. But fear, which is a dangerous counsellor, has forced on them a system of allegations which are not in conformity with the truth. The regard which I have for the guilty sufficiently explains what my conscience prescribes towards an innocent person. Mr. Allsop is pursued as an accomplice. Well then, I am bound to say that Mr. Allsop has had no knowledge of this project of assassination. He assisted me in the making of the bombs, in the belief that they were to be employed in an insurrectionary attempt in Italy. As to M. Bernard, the respect I owe to truth does not permit me to affirm that I have not told him that the bombs were to be employed in France, but I cannot still assert that I told him so. I often conversed with him about Italy than about France.

This exposition of his plans was made by the prisoner with the utmost calmness; there was nothing inflated in his tone, and there appeared little or no affectation in his manner. The President thought that Orsini was aiming at a character for generosity which was not consistent with his original examination. He reminded him of his remark, that disposed as he was to be generous, the object of that feeling must be worthy of it and that his accomplices did not appear to him to deserve any sacrifice on his part. He thought he ought to give explanations, the result of which was that each one should keep for himself the part that belonged to him. Orsini related his first meeting with Pierri, and then with Rudio and Gomez. Being pressed on this point he refused to say any more. He merely avowed his participation in the transport of the bombs and of the fulminating powder. On arriving at the events of the 14th his voice which was before strong and firm, appeared to falter. He avowed the meeting of the accomplices in the Rue Monthabor, and their proceeding to the Rue Lepelletier. He denied it was he who gave the order to throw the bombs. He himself would not have thrown any. The one he was to throw was given by him to another Italian whose name and co-operation he had concealed from his accomplices. Wounded by the first explosion he had lost his sight, and it was he who, before entering the shop of the apothecary, had let fall the pistol and the grenade picked up at two yards from the shop.

We have received the following telegram from our Paris correspondent:—

"Paris, Feb. 26, 10 p. m.

"The jury has given a verdict of Guilty as regards the four accused.

"The Court has pronounced sentence of death on Orsini, Rudio and Pierri

"Gomez is sentenced to penal servitude for life."

ARRESTS IN PARIS.—Apropos we may mention that arrests are now going on wholesale in Paris. General Espinasse pretends that there was great danger for the tenth anniversary of February, 1848, and people are thrown into prison in Paris and in the Provinces, literally by hundreds, but without any noise being made. Three lawyers were imprisoned last week. However, the Conseil des Avocats took up the business, and applied to the Minister of Justice; the answer was, that no explanations could be given but that these three gentlemen were taken up for intrigues and manœuvres during the late Paris elections (ten months back!) This is the excuse generally given.

Attempt to Escape from the Penitentiary.

From the Alton Courier, 9th.

One of the most singular cases which ever came under our observation, or in our reading, occurred yesterday morning at the Penitentiary in this city.

A convict named Hall, from Chicago, who is now serving out a second term, formed the idea of acquiring his liberty, in the following method. He watched his opportunity shortly after breakfast, and when no other guard was in the hall surrounding the cells except Mr. Crabb, whom he knocked down and stunned by a severe blow on the head, then dragged him into one of the lower cells, tied Crabb's hands behind his back, fastened the cell door by means of a stick of timber previously put in the cell by some confederate, then drew a huge knife from his bosom, assisted Crabb to rise, put him against the door, and then threatened him with death unless he was allowed to go at liberty.

The most daring attempt was soon known and promptly brought Col. Buckmaster and his guards to the spot. The convict threatened Crabb with instant death if any attempt was made upon the door, holding the knife within a couple inches of Crabb's breast. For upwards of an hour Col. Buckmaster and his guards watched an opportunity to shoot him, but there being but one opening in the door, and that quite small, he kept Crabb constantly between him and the opening, so that he could only be reached through Crabb's body.

Thus matters continued until noon, when Crabb made some efforts to open the door, but was immediately cut severely in the hand by the convict. During the day the convict stated his terms of submission to be a revolver, loaded by himself, a full suit of citizen's dress, $100 in money, and to be driven out of town in a close carriage, accompanied by Crabb, to such a place as he should designate; all of which were of course inadmissible. In the meantime, however, Col. Buckmaster procured a pardon from the Governor, to be used in his discretion; but up to 12 o'clock last night, no information of it had been given to the convict. All day the guards were on the watch to shoot the scoundrel, but as he had positively declared he would kill Crabb if he was not instantly killed himself, great care had to be taken, for fear he might put his threat in execution. Crabb had so arms whatever, the yard guards not being allowed to carry any, and had nothing whatever to defend himself from any attack of the desperado.

About eleven o'clock last night, one of the guards got a shot at him, but averted his fire upon a change of position, for fear of shooting Crabb.

The entrance to the cell is very narrow, the door of plate iron, with a small grating at the top for ventilation. The door opens inwards and is very strongly fastened. It is impossible to get at the scoundrel without using great force, which we learn would be applied this morning, unless he should be shot during the night. During the day great fears were entertained that he would kill the guard, and for fear of that, active operations were not pushed forward. Those best informed think there is very little danger of his putting his threat into execution, as he must know that death would instantly be his lot.

Hall, the convict is represented to be a most desperate scoundrel. In view of his character and his threats, our citizens were yesterday much alarmed for the safety of Crabb, who is well known and highly appreciated, and who has a family residing in the city.

Yesterday everything was done which could be done consistently with Crabb's safety. No chance would the convict give for any injury to himself, as he either studiously kept Crabb between him and the grating, or laid down against the door, and out of the reach of a shot. He professed to have no ill-feeling to Crabb, but had deliberately planned his method of gaining his liberty, and would kill Crabb and then kill himself unless he was pardoned and taken in the manner stated.

FURTHER PARTICULARS.

The revolt at the State Prison, or rather the insurrection of the desperado Lindsay, was brought to a termination this morning chan's store, received two blows on the fore and back part of the head. At this time, the affair had turned into a regular riot—pistols were freely produced, and it was feared that lives would be lost. The lane in front of Colborne street was densely crowded, and it required the aid of a strong body of constables, under Mr. Sherwood, to disperse them; but this was not accomplished until a young man named Mathew Sheady, a porter in the employment of William McMaster, Esq., received a stab from a pitchfork, in the abdomen, which, it is feared, will prove fatal. The unfortunate man, we are informed, was not engaged in the row, but had rendered material aid to the Deputy Chief in quelling the disturbance. He was taken into Mr. Millers drug-store, and after being attended to by Dr. Hallowell, was removed to the Hospital. A large crowd followed the cart upon which the sufferer was placed, and this added not a little to the excitement. Active measures were taken in the evening, by the Mayor, to preserve the peace of the city—a number of special constables having been sworn in. Intimation was also given to have the military ready to be called out in case of any emergency arising.

The Examiner.

TUESDAY, MARCH 23, 1858.

Our Subscribers and Advertising Patrons are respectfully informed that, in future, we will appear on Thursday, instead of, as heretofore, on Tuesday; the end of the week seeming to be most in accordance with the leisure of the farming community, as we judge by their delaying generally to call for their papers until then. They will, in this way, get the news more nearly up to the time of their demand for it.

The Government Position.

The difficulties attending the continuance of the Government under the leadership of Mr. Macdonald, are becoming every day more apparent. From the outset there has been a steady majority against him from Upper Canada, upon general as well as particular questions, and until representation is based upon population, of course it is right that the ministers representing Upper Canada in the Cabinet, should be possessed of the confidence of that section of the House as expressed by its majority, equally so as in respect to Lower Canada; for, although the union of the two Provinces was legislative, yet, since one section is allowed a permanent equality with the other, no matter how far one may pass the other in population, the federative principle cannot be said not to have entered into the account, but the contrary; and there is as good ground for applying the principle to the Administration, as to the Legislature, for the proper sympathy between the administrators of the laws and the people is as necessary, under responsible government, as between the people and the Legislature. Capital is sought to be made for the Ministry, by assuming that the present government is the only one the country will afford, but this is all nonsense, as has been proved over and over again; for, no sooner does the occasion arise, than there is sure to be found some person fitted to supply it. And as to the supposed difficulties existing among those who are opposed to the Government, they only prove the sincerity of the Opposition, and the various grounds upon which opinions can be raised against the Government. It is not, to be sure, enough, that the Government being deserted by a majority from either section, upon an indifferent question, they should feel themselves called upon to resign, but it is upon a uninterrupted succession of such misfortunes, upon important questions, among them that of a direct want of confidence, that they should take a survey of their position, and see how hopeless it is for them to expect to stand respectable before the country. The Ministerial party need have no fear of the consequences to the country following a change of administration, and a change of policy. The talent is with the Opposition, and as they are able to establish the unworthiness of the Government, so they will be able to steer clear of the causes that have led to the reduction of the Ministry in the estimation of the country.

Mr. Conger has written to the Editor of the Peterborough Review a letter, intended more for Mr. George Brown than the people of Peterborough; and he has also written to us, stating that an error crept into his explanation of the debenture business, which is this: the quantity of debentures was in currency, not in sterling; a correction we are glad to be able to make for him. There is a question, however, we would like further explanation from Mr. Conger upon: if, as he says, the whole quantity, £20,000 sterling, "was handed over to him on the 20th October, the government having no control over them," and "really nothing to do in the matter," how is it that this whole sum did not reach Peterborough? There is no reconciling the palpable contradiction between the implication in the next sentence, that the township of Wolfesd, owing the government £15,000 sterling, that sum was deducted, before payment, with the plain straightforward acknowledgment of Mr. Conger, that he received the whole amount; and there is this further difficulty with Mr. Conger, that he always held out privately when questioned about the draw-back, that he held the receipt of Wolfesd therefor. We give Mr. Conger's letter in full, and inquiring people may put upon it what construction they think it will bear. We took upon it as a shuffle and one worthy of its author.

A Mirror of Parliament is to be constituted after the fashion of Hansard's Reports, wherein everything said in the House will be reported. The reports are already too long. Much said in the House had better be forgotten.

The Gravel Road By-Law.

The vote on the £50,000 County By-lay, to be taken on Wednesday, (to-morrow) is likely to give a majority of municipalities against the gravel road scheme.—The rate-payers of the township of Monaghan have held a meeting, at which the matter was discussed, and upon explanations given by the Reeve, Thos. Eyres, Esq., satisfactory to the minds of those present, concerning the movement as it appeared in the County Council the result of the deliberation was that the subjoined expression of opinion in the shape of a resolution received unanimous approval:

That the Ratepayers of the Township of North Monaghan take this public opportunity of expressing their entire disapprobation of the course pursued at the late sitting of the County Council in endeavouring to force a system of Gravel Roads upon the county, contrary no doubt, to the wish of the majority, during a season of financial pressure, experienced over every part of the Province—and in view of the consequent difficulties which must necessarily arise in the sale of Debentures, and also by striving to carry the same by basing the votes upon Municipalities, in place of allowing every Ratepayer of the several Municipalities an opportunity of expressing his vote for or against the measure, which if done, would have removed all reasonable grounds of complaint, but as matters now stand, every exertion should be used in order to prevent the By-Law authorized to be printed by said Council becoming law.

North Monaghan, Wednesday, March 17, '58.

The townships of Otonabee and Smith are deadly enemies to the By-law. The township of Ennismore sees the trick that its promoters have attempted to gain its approbation with, by inducing it to believe in the false assurance that bridges would be built over Mud Lake and Pigeon Lake, and so Ennismore will have nothing to do with raising money to promote improvements it does not share in. The town of Peterboro' wants to know who it was that picked up three debentures of £500 sterling each, and forgot to make a memorandum of it, before it an be induced to speculate in any larger undertaking than at present it has in hand. The township of Douro will oppose the passage of the By-law, and the remaining townships of Dummer, Asphodel, and Belmont have not been heard from, but no doubt they are wise in their generation. On the whole, then, we have reason to expect that a lesson will be taught to those gentlemen who go about with their hands in their pockets, watching for an opportunity to change them for other people's pockets, which will do them much good; and there is this remaining consolation that, in the event of the vote being taken favorable to the By-law, which is barely possible under any circumstances, the illegality of the proceedings directed to be taken by the Municipalities, in the notice at foot of the By-law, is made so evident, as will be seen on reference to the statutes, that there is no possibility of putting it in force. Nevertheless we treat the ratepayers will not remain silent, but give their vote as though they meant it, and rely on the moral effect it will produce.

Peterboro', March 15th, 1858.

Sir,—Mr. Conger has requested me to inform you, that he conceives that certain expressions, contained in the leader of "The Examiner," of the 9th inst under the heading "The £50,000 Road By-law" are calculated to be injurious to his character, and exceed the bounds accorded to the Press.

You will be good enough therefore, to retract such expressions in as public a manner as they have been made, otherwise my instructions are to take such proceedings in the matter as the Law directs.

I am, sir, your obdt. servant,
C. A. WELLER, Solicitor.

A. Secor, Esq.,
Peterboro'.

In conformity with the request contained in the above document, having examined "the Examiner of the 9th instant," and found that, in the last paragraph of the article referred to, we advised Mr. Conger to mind his own business, thereby assuming that Mr. Conger had business of his own to mind, we have fallen into an unwarrantable error, and we now beg to correct it. By declaring, in the manner prescribed by his Solicitor, that in view of Mr. Conger having no business of his own to mind, he ought to be permitted to mind other people's. With a proper remorse for having used an expression which Mr. Conger conceives "to be injurious to his character," we beg him to accord to us the bounds he thinks should be accorded to the Press.
